INTRODUCTION

I magine a world where the women around you—your sister, mother, or partner, aren't happy or living their lives to the fullest.

Can you truly stay happy in such a world? Could you enjoy going out or savouring great food? The answer is no.

In today's world, many people either don't know or don't care about "how to treat her right." Everything has its right and wrong, often decided by individuals, especially men.

But,

What are the things that shouldn't be compromised? What measures must not be overlooked?

This book is the first of its kind.

It highlights the two-way nature of relationships: her words, his actions, his drama, and her response.

Don't you think this is worth exploring?

In today's world, hookup culture is one of the biggest issues our young generation faces. But no one talks about why it's happening in the first place or how it began. We've moved from a generation where looking at women disrespectfully was considered sinful to a time where phrases like "no strings attached" are common.

How did this happen?

How did we forget the respect and treatment that women received in earlier generations, even those values mentioned in the Vedas and Puranas? Women deserve respect and dignity, not to be made to feel insignificant.

So, let's rewire our minds and structure them in a way that truly makes us gentlemen. Many of you must have wondered:

How can she appreciate my heart and nature instead of just my appearance? Even if I don't have six-pack abs or a bank account filled with cash?

Join me on this journey to actually learn, practice, and embrace

As a man, I understand how the male mind works.

Don't fool yourself into thinking you know it all.

There are things women don't express. Have you ever considered why your girl doesn't share her thoughts with you? Why does she hesitate? She fears

Will you understand?

How will you react?

Will you handle the situation or make it worse?

Join me in making your girl the happiest in the world!

DEDICATION

To Mumma and Papa,

For believing in me even when I doubted myself.

To my sisters,

For being my forever cheerleaders and partners in crime.

To my family,

For your endless love and support that fuels my dreams.

And to Mental Khana,

For the conversations, laughs, and sanity checks that kept me going.

This journey wouldn't have been possible without you all!

WHY DOES THIS BOOK MATTER?

A few days ago, I was talking to an old friend. He mentioned something that left me stunned: “I kissed a girl who’s a good friend of mine. We’ve known each other since school, and we’ve agreed to be physically available for each other whenever we want.”

Internally, my honest reaction was: “What? Why? Don’t you want a serious relationship with clear terms and expectations?”

WHY IS THIS BOOK IMPORTANT?

1. Understanding Her Beyond Words:

Many men struggle to grasp what their partner truly wants to convey or how she feels emotionally and mentally. Often, they focus only on the words she says. This book teaches men to adopt a balanced approach that is strong yet sensitive, supportive yet independent.

1. Building True Partnerships:

What makes a relationship grow? It's mutual respect and feeling valued. This book isn't just about making her happy or feeling good. It's about creating a partnership where you both thrive, succeed, and feel safe together.

1. Personal Growth:

At its heart, this book isn't just about treating her right; it's about becoming the best version of yourself—a better partner, a better communicator, someone she can trust, respect, and love deeply.

1. Breaking Stereotypes:

Men are taught to suppress their vulnerability and avoid showing emotions from a young age. This mindset is instilled in us both at home and in society. But it doesn't work in the modern relationship landscape. This book encourages men to embrace a more balanced approach where vulnerability and strength coexist.

1. Practical and Realistic Guidance:

Let's face it—there's no instruction manual for modern relationships. Most advice is vague or unrealistic. This book cuts through the noise, offering clear, actionable steps grounded in real-life experiences.

Treating her right isn't about empty promises or false hopes. It's about responsibility, honesty, and consistent communication. It's about showing up every day with love, respect, and intention. It's about truly listening, understanding, and growing together.

And that's exactly why this book matters. This isn't just a book; it's your guide, your best friend, offering actionable tips with the right mindset. It's here to help men build meaningful, respectful, and lasting relationships.

Together, we'll redefine what it means to be a man in a relationship and do it correctly. Let's get started.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN TO TREAT HER RIGHT?

“Treating her right” goes far beyond gestures like flowers, fancy dinners, or saying the right words at the right time. It’s more about the mindset that drives you to think and act in ways that strengthen the bond. It revolves around understanding, respect, and mutual growth. It’s about being there for her in ways that truly matter, building trust, and fostering a relationship where both partners feel valued and safe.

TO TREAT HER RIGHT IS TO:

1. Understand her as an individual

Every woman is unique. Her emotions, dreams, fears, and experiences shape who she is. Treating her right means taking the time to understand her, what makes her truly happy, what worries her, and how she views the world.

1. Respect her boundaries and choices

Respect isn't just about what you say but what you do. True respect lies in valuing her opinions, honouring her boundaries, and supporting her choices, even if they differ from yours.

1. Be Her Emotional Anchor

Being her emotional anchor means being someone she can lean on without fear of judgment. It involves offering reassurance, listening with empathy, and providing a safe space for her to express herself.

1. Prioritise Partnership Over Ego

A healthy relationship is a partnership, not a power struggle. It's about teamwork, lifting each other up, sharing responsibilities, and facing life's challenges together as equals.

1. Encourage Each Other to Grow

To make your relationship as strong as a fighter plane braving tough winds yet reaching its destination, encourage each other to grow. Treating her right means celebrating her achievements, supporting her aspirations, and working together to overcome anything hindering growth or happiness.

1. Communicate Clearly and Honestly

Clear and honest communication forms the backbone of any relationship. Whether you're sharing your feelings, discussing expectations, or resolving conflicts, treating her right means being transparent and genuine. (We'll explore this deeply in the upcoming chapters.)

Treating her right isn't about perfection but about effort, care, and consistency. It's about recognising that relationships are a journey and committing to making that journey meaningful and fulfilling for both of you.

In this book, we'll change what it means to treat her right, breaking down misconceptions and providing actionable tools to build a strong, lasting partnership. It's about setting a new standard for love rooted in respect, connection, and mutual growth.

You better buckle up!

SECTION 1

Foundations of a Healthy Relationship

CHAPTER 1

Emotional Compatibility: The Cornerstone

Introduction

She was an overthinker, constantly spiralling into scenarios with little chance of becoming a reality. Yet, those thoughts consumed her, leaving her anxious and overwhelmed. When I first met her, she kept those emotions bottled up, never sharing them with anyone.

But as days turned into weeks of genuine conversations, something shifted. She began opening up and sharing thoughts and situations she had never voiced before. Why? Because she felt understood. She felt heard. For the first time, she found emotional support she could rely on without fear of being judged.

Think of emotional compatibility as the foundation of a house. The walls built with love, trust, and mutual respect cannot stand strong without it.

What do we use to stick things together? Glue, right? Emotional compatibility is the glue that holds a relationship together. It's not just about having common interests or enjoying each other's company; it's about truly understanding and supporting one another on a deeper level. When two people are emotionally compatible, they create a safe space where vulnerability is embraced, not judged. It ensures that when you both hit a rough patch or face life's highs and lows, you feel secure, heard, and understood.

In this chapter, we will explore why emotional compatibility matters, how it deepens your bond and practical ways to cultivate it. A relationship rooted in emotional compatibility doesn't just survive; it thrives, becoming a haven for both partners.

Creating a Safe Emotional Space

Imagine a couple, Rahul and Meera. Rahul has always been scared of failure; it's something he's carried with him since childhood. Meera, on the other hand, struggles with anxiety whenever she feels like she's disappointing someone, even in small ways.

In the beginning, they didn't talk much about these fears.

Rahul thought, "Why would Meera understand? She's always so confident." Meera, too, kept her worries hidden, afraid Rahul might think she was overthinking or being too emotional.

But one day, after a tough day at work, Rahul finally shared what was on his mind. He told Meera about his fear of failing and how it sometimes kept him awake at night. Instead of brushing it off, Meera listened patiently. She didn't try to fix it or tell him it wasn't a big deal.

She said, "I'm here for you, no matter what."

That moment was a turning point. Rahul realised he could trust Meera with his feelings. Encouraged by his openness, Meera began to share her struggles with anxiety. Rahul didn't judge her or try to dismiss her feelings,

"He took her hand and assured her she wasn't facing it alone."

This is what creating a safe emotional space looks like: it's when both partners feel comfortable being themselves and sharing their deepest fears and feelings without hesitation.

It's about knowing that your partner will listen, understand, and stand by you, no matter what.

When you build this kind of connection, it becomes a sanctuary—a place where both of you find comfort and strength, weathering life's storms together.

In this space, true love doesn't just grow; it flourishes and gives you the strength to do more.

Why Reassurance Matters More Than You Think

Why does reassurance matter?

Why is there a need to repeat it again and again, even after you've said it once? Why? And what happens if you don't offer it?

These are questions people often ask me, and here's how I explain them:

Reassurance is like watering a plant. If you nourish it daily, it grows strong, blooms beautifully, and creates a fresh, vibrant environment. But what if you plant the seed and expect it to water itself?

Imagine locking it in a pot and leaving it to survive on whatever moisture the soil already has. Over time, the water runs out, the leaves start to fade, the roots dry up, and the plant withers.

A relationship works the same way. Reassurance is the nourishment that keeps it alive and thriving. It's not something you can do once and expect to last forever. Relationships demand consistent care—daily reminders of love, support, and presence.

Saying “I love you” or “I'm here for you” isn't a one-time thing; it's an ongoing commitment to your partner's emotional well-being.

Our human minds often assume that saying it once is enough. But it's not. Love isn't static; it's dynamic, evolving with every interaction. Reassurance bridges the gap between doubt and security, making your partner feel cherished and valued day after day.

Are you feeling a spark in your heart to brighten someone's day? Great! Take a moment to do something small but meaningful – send them a sweet message, a cute drawing, or even just a simple “I'm thinking of you.”

You've got this! Let's make their day better together.

Quick Takeaways: Building Emotional Bridges

#	Steps
1.	Recognise the distance and bring it up gently with your partner, saying something like, “I feel like we’ve been distant lately. Can we talk?”

	2.	Listen to their perspective without interrupting, focusing on understanding their feelings.
	3.	Share your feelings honestly to create trust and invite openness.
	4.	Work together on small steps to reconnect, like spending quality time or addressing misunderstandings.
	5.	Reassure them with simple reminders like, “I’m here for us,” and stay consistent in your efforts.

CHAPTER 2

Mental Compatibility: Growing Together

Anjali had always been a dreamer; she knew what she wanted to do from a very young age. She envisioned creating a home- designed bag brand that would blend her creativity and passion.

Ever since she was a kid, she had been stitching fabric scraps into little purses, imagining the day she could turn her hobby into something real.

Finally, after months of planning, saving, and sketching, Anjali felt ready to take the next big step. Over dinner one evening, she excitedly told Rohan, her boyfriend of three years, about her plans. “I’ve got it all mapped out,” she said, her face glowing enthusiastically. “I’ll start small, work from home, and build from there. I just need to hire a small team and start networking.”

But Rohan’s response wasn’t what she expected. Instead of excitement, his face tensed with worry. “Are you sure this is a good idea?” he asked cautiously. “I mean, you’ll have to spend so much time with strangers, building a team and managing everything. Won’t that... take time away from us?”

Anjali’s heart dropped a beat. “Rohan, this is my dream. I’m not leaving you behind. I just want something that’s mine, something I can be proud of.” But Rohan couldn’t shake his concerns. The thought of her dedicating so much of her time and energy elsewhere made him feel uneasy. He didn’t say “No,” but his hesitance was loud enough.

Slowly, Anjali began pulling back. She started convincing herself that maybe now wasn’t the right time.

Weeks passed, and Anjali found herself stuck in a continuous loop of compromise, not because she wanted to, but because she didn’t want to upset Rohan. She loved him, but she was getting resentful. Meanwhile, Rohan convinced himself that his hesitation was justified and that he was protecting their relationship. What neither of them realised was that they were drifting apart, unable to bridge the gap between their individual needs and their shared life.

This isn't about who was wrong or right. It's about what happens when mental compatibility is missing in a relationship. Rohan's fear of losing Anjali could have been an opportunity to support her and grow together. Anjali's dream could have been something they celebrated as a team instead of a break that came between them.

Mental compatibility isn't about agreeing on everything. It's about supporting each other's individuality, finding a balance, and encouraging each other's dreams while staying connected.

In this chapter, we dive into why growing together matters, how cheering for her dreams strengthens your bond, and why mental compatibility is the secret sauce to a thriving relationship. Stick around for some quick, fun tips to keep the spark alive and the teamwork strong!

The Importance of a Growth Mindset

When two people come together in a relationship, differences are bound to arise differences in dreams, thought processes, or ways of handling challenges. How a couple handles these differences often determines the strength of their bond.

Now, let's talk about Vishnu and Prachi to give you better clarity on why having a growth mindset is so important. It's one of those decisions that can make or break your relationship. One decision holds all the power to shape what happens next!

Prachi is passionate about starting something of her own, while Vishnu is unsure about what it might mean for their relationship. Instead of dismissing her dreams by imagining fearful scenarios, a growth mindset encourages seeing this as a chance to understand the situation, support your partner, and make sure you grow together.

So, what exactly is a growth mindset? It's about opening up to challenges and being willing to learn, even when it's uncomfortable. It's about believing that relationships, just like people, are not fixed.

They can grow, adapt to changes, and improve with effort over time, becoming more meaningful for both partners.

When both partners adopt this mindset:

- They celebrate each other's ambitions rather than fear them.
- They work through challenges with curiosity instead of judgment.
- They create a relationship where both individuals can thrive and grow.

So, when you feel resistance to change, pause and ask yourself: Am I seeing this as a threat or an opportunity? A simple shift in perspective can transform your connection, making it stronger with every step forward.

Supporting Her Ambitions

In a relationship, one of the most meaningful ways to show love is by supporting your partner's dreams. It's not just about saying, "I'm proud of you," but showing it through your actions.

Imagine this: Prachi has always dreamed of starting her own business, designing unique, handcrafted bags. It's something she's passionate about, something that lights her up. But Vishnu struggles to accept the idea. The thought of her working long hours, meeting new people, and dedicating time to her dream makes him uneasy.

Here's the thing: supporting someone's ambitions doesn't mean you won't feel uncomfortable or unsure. It means choosing to stand by them despite those feelings. Prachi's dream isn't just about bags; it's about proving to herself that she can create something meaningful.

By supporting her:

- Vishnu would show that he values her as an individual, not just as his partner.
- He would help her grow, which in turn would strengthen their relationship.

Support isn't always a grand gesture. Sometimes, it's as simple as listening, offering encouragement, or helping with small tasks. It reminds her that she's not alone in this journey.

When you support her ambitions, you send a powerful message: I believe in you and am here for you. That kind of partnership builds trust and deepens your bond in ways nothing else can.

Quick Takeaways: Building Mental Compatibility

Steps	Action	Why it Matters
Encourage Her Dreams	Support her ambitions and ideas, even if they seem uncertain.	Showing you believe in her vision strengthens trust and emotional connection
Communicate Openly	Have honest conversations about hopes, fears, and goals.	Open communication helps align your paths and builds understanding.
Challenge Each Other	Push each other to grow intellectually and emotionally.	Growth comes when you challenge each other to think differently and expand your perspectives.
Be Patient and Flexible	Understand that change takes time, and not all decisions will be perfect.	Mental compatibility thrives when there's room for mistakes and learning.

Respect Individual Growth	Encourage each other's personal development and respect each other's journeys.	A strong mental connection is built when both partners support each other's self-growth.
Celebrate Successes Together	Acknowledge and appreciate each other's achievements, big or small.	Celebrating accomplishments strengthens your bond and reinforces shared goals.
Practise Empathy	Put yourself in her shoes and understand her struggles and triumphs.	Mental compatibility flourishes when empathy leads your actions and words.

How to Take Care of Her During Periods

Periods aren't just about cramps and discomfort; they can come with a rollercoaster of emotions, fatigue, cravings, and sometimes a feeling of isolation. If she's on her period, don't act clueless or dismissive. Instead, be proactive. Ask her what she needs, whether it's a hot water bottle, her favourite snacks, or a cosy blanket to curl up in.

It's not always about fixing things; sometimes, just being there is enough. Avoid comments like, "Oh, it's just period. Get over it." These words can make her feel unheard and invalidated. Instead, say something like, "I know you're not feeling your best. How can I make it easier for you today?"

Remember, every woman experiences her periods differently. Some might want space, while others might crave comfort and company. Pay attention to her preferences, and don't hesitate to educate yourself about what she's going through. It's the little gestures like remembering to bring her water or watching her favourite show with her that make a big difference.

SECTION 2

Building True Intimacy

CHAPTER 3

Physical Compatibility: The Last Piece of the Puzzle

Nowadays many young adults bypass the essential steps of building emotional and mental connections, which are crucial for a strong and lasting relationship foundation.

Instead, they often prioritise the physical aspects of a relationship. But why is this happening? Is it the influence of societal trends, media, or a shift in values? Despite widespread awareness that physical compatibility should complement emotional and mental bonds, it often takes centre stage.

The question isn't just about "what" is happening - it's about "why." Why are so many investing heavily in physical intimacy first, overlooking the deeper, more meaningful connections?

The truth is that society has normalised a surface-level connection in today's world. Social media, instant gratification, and quick dating interactions have shifted the focus towards physical attraction and temporary satisfaction. It's easier to get caught up in the rush of physical chemistry because it feels tangible, immediate, and exciting.

But this often leaves people feeling hollow, longing for something more meaningful without realising that the emotional and mental bond is what truly sustains a relationship in the long run. When you give into the physical aspect before establishing an emotional and mental connection, the relationship is built on shaky ground. It's like constructing a house without a solid foundation. Eventually, the cracks start to show.

Without trust that holds, understanding that smiles and mutual respect that grows, things will feel empty and disconnected. Only when both partners are emotionally and mentally in sync can they fully experience the depth of physical connection.

Take Vishnu and Prachi, for example. While they're physically attracted to each other, the lack of emotional and mental connection often causes friction. Vishnu's anger issues and Prachi's fears of not being supported in her dreams create emotional walls between them, leaving their physical connection strained. They both realise that true intimacy doesn't just come from physical closeness. It comes from feeling safe and valued on a much deeper level.

In this chapter, we will explore how focusing on emotional and mental compatibility, instead of rushing into the physical, leads to a much deeper and more lasting connection. By reconnecting with the true essence of intimacy,

We'll understand how to build a relationship that's not just about the now but one that grows over time.

Understanding How Emotional and Mental Connection Matters

Let's put ourselves in Vishnu and Prachi's shoes to understand this in their conversation!

Vishnu: "I don't get it, Prachi. Why do you always want to talk about feelings and thoughts all the time? It just feels like too much sometimes."

Prachi: "I know it might seem like a lot, Vishnu, but these conversations matter. For me, it's not just about saying I love you; it's about feeling understood. If I don't feel emotionally and mentally connected with you, everything else feels off. And when we don't talk about what's going on in our heads and hearts, we start drifting apart without even realising it."

Vishnu: "But isn't the physical part enough? You know, like the moments we share, the touch, the intimacy?"

Prachi: “Those things matter, of course. But without a solid emotional and mental connection, even those moments can feel empty. Think of it this way—when we’ve had a heart-to-heart conversation, I feel seen and heard by you. That’s when I feel most connected to you—even more than when we’re just physically close. Without that mental and emotional bond, the physical connection is only temporary. It’s when we are aligned emotionally and mentally that we can build something stronger, something that lasts.”

Vishnu: “I see. So it’s not just about me saying ‘I love you,’ but really listening, really understanding what you’re going through, what you need?”

Prachi: “Exactly. When we talk about what scares me, what excites me, what makes me anxious, or even what makes me happy, it creates this safe space for both of us. I can’t expect to feel fully connected if I can’t express myself openly and feel like you’re there with me, mentally and emotionally. The more we share and understand each other, the stronger the bond becomes.”

Vishnu: “I get it now. So, you’re saying that when we take the time to connect on this deeper level, it actually strengthens everything—our relationship, our trust, and even our physical connection. It’s like the foundation of the house, right?”

Prachi: “Exactly. When we’re connected emotionally and mentally, the physical side of things becomes so much more meaningful. We become partners in every way, supporting each other and growing together. And it’s not just about solving problems together, but also about celebrating each other’s dreams, fears, and everything in between.”

Vishnu: “That makes sense. It’s about understanding each other on a deeper level. So, no matter what life throws at us, we’ll be able to handle it together. And when we do finally share those physical moments, it’s built on something solid, something real.”

Prachi: “Exactly. Without that emotional and mental connection, nothing else really matters. But when it’s there, everything else naturally falls into place, and that’s when we truly feel close, in every sense of the word.”

This conversation between Vishnu and Prachi highlights the importance of emotional and mental connection in a relationship.

While physical attachment is important, it’s the emotional and mental bond that truly creates a lasting, fulfilling relationship. Only when you understand each other on a deeper level can you build a foundation that supports every other aspect of your relationship, including the physical aspect of it.

Prioritising Emotional Connection Over Physical Desires

Before we even entered into a relationship, I spent months getting to know her. We spent hours talking over the phone and over video calls, sharing stories, dreams, and silly moments. We did cute things for each other, like sending random texts just to make each other smile or planning little surprises that made us feel special. Those early days of building a connection, long conversations, laughter, and thoughtful gestures were the foundation of trust between us.

During those months, we didn’t rush into anything physical. Instead, we focused on understanding each other’s values, quirks, and what annoyed us. I could see how much she cared about me, not just through her words but through the effort she put into making me feel heard, supported, and valued. It was these moments of emotional closeness that laid the groundwork for something real and lasting.

I realised that this emotional bond and our ability to connect on a deeper level before anything physical came into play made our relationship strong. It wasn’t about rushing into physical intimacy to feel close. The real attachment came from feeling emotionally secure with each other. This emotional foundation allowed us to trust one another, knowing that we could rely on each other not just for the fun, exciting moments but also through the challenges life throws our way.

In those early months, I learned something crucial: When you build trust and emotional intimacy first, the physical connection becomes more meaningful. It's not just about sharing space or physical intimacy; it's about feeling truly seen and understood. And that foundation is what continues to strengthen our bond today.

CHAPTER 4

What is Consent for Her?

Introduction

If she says “no,” that means “no.” There is no hidden meaning, no unspoken message telling you to push harder, be more stubborn, and try again. “No” is a complete and final word, and it should be respected. But far too often, there’s a misconception that when a woman says “No,” she doesn’t really mean it, that she’s just playing hard to get, or that she wants you to try again with more intensity.

But let me ask this: Don’t you have a mind of your own? Don’t you value her voice?

Don’t you value her comfort?

Don’t you value her right to choose?

In any relationship, there is nothing more important than respect for each other’s boundaries. Without it, trust breaks, and the bond between partners becomes weakened. It’s crucial to understand that consent is not a game. It’s not a test of how far you can push.

Boys, understand this: Your partner has the right to say “no” at any moment, and this word, in whatever context it is used, must be respected fully and without hesitation.

Think about it: A relationship, whether casual or serious, is built on mutual respect. If you fail to honour her consent, you not only harm the relationship, but you also harm the trust and emotional safety that should be the foundation of any connection.

In this chapter, we’ll explore why consent is about more than respecting boundaries. It is about creating a deeper, more meaningful relationship based on mutual understanding and trust.

Understanding the Deep Meaning of Consent

Picture this: Vishnu and Prachi have been in a relationship for over a year. They share a deep emotional bond, often spending hours talking about their dreams, fears, and everything in between. One evening, they find themselves in an intimate situation. Vishnu leans in closer, sensing the moment. Prachi hesitates, her body language subtly withdrawing. She gently says, “I’m not sure if I’m ready for this.”

Now, Vishnu has two choices. He could either ignore her hesitation, assuming she’ll be okay if he pushes a little further, or he could stop, take a moment, and respect her feelings.

Vishnu chooses the second option. He steps back and reassures her, “That’s okay, Prachi. We don’t have to do anything you’re not comfortable with.” Her face softens with relief, and the trust between them deepens. This is consent in action. It’s about understanding that intimacy is not just physical; it’s about mutual comfort, trust, and emotional safety.

It’s a misconception that consent is a “one-time yes” that applies forever. Consent is ongoing, fluid, and requires active participation from both partners. It’s about paying attention to verbal and non-verbal cues and respecting boundaries at every step.

By honoring Prachi’s feelings, Vishnu not only showed her that her emotions mattered but also strengthened the emotional connection between them.

When you understand the deep meaning of consent, it creates a safe space where both partners feel valued and respected. It’s not about getting a “yes” at any cost; it’s about ensuring that both individuals are equally ready and willing to share that moment.

How Consent Goes Beyond Physical Acts

Take Vishnu and Prachi, for example. Prachi enjoys her personal space while working, and Vishnu knows that. One afternoon, while she’s deeply focused on her project, Vishnu asks if he can hang out and chat. Prachi pauses and says, “Maybe later. I need to finish this first.” Instead of insisting, Vishnu respects her need for space and gives her time. That’s consent. It’s not just about “yes” or “no” in physically intimate; it's about listening to and respecting each other's boundaries in everything.

Here's what consent really looks like:

Listening: Hearing your partner out when they say what they need or don't need, whether it's about their emotions, decisions, or personal time.

Checking In: Relationships change, and so do comfort levels. Asking and checking in keeps things respectful.

Reading Between the Lines: Not every boundary is spoken out loud. Sometimes, a partner's silence, hesitation, or body language says it all.

Consent is what strengthens your emotional and mental connection and truly makes a relationship go high.

Boundaries and Her Comfort Zone

Every person has boundaries for things they are comfortable with and things they aren't. These boundaries act like invisible lines that define their comfort zone, and respecting them is one of the simplest yet most powerful ways to show love and care in a relationship. Let's imagine Vishnu and Prachi again. Prachi enjoys attending social events but doesn't like being the centre of attention. At a party, Vishnu tries to introduce her to a large group of people. Noticing her hesitation, he quickly changes the plan and instead introduces her to just a couple of close friends. In doing so, he respects her comfort zone without forcing her into a situation that makes her uneasy.

Now, respecting boundaries isn't about agreeing with everything; it's about understanding and valuing the other person's feelings. Here's how you can do it:

1. Ask, Don't Assume: Never assume you know what she's okay with. A simple "Are you comfortable with this?" can make a huge difference.
2. Be Observant: Pay attention to her reactions. Sometimes, actions or expressions say more than words.
3. Communicate Openly: Encourage her to share her feelings and boundaries with you without fear of judgment.

4. Give Space When Needed: Everyone needs their own space sometimes. Respecting this shows that you trust her and value her independence.

When you respect her boundaries, you show her that her comfort matters to you. It further builds and strengthens the bond and creates a relationship where both partners feel valued and understood.

Quick Takeaways: Consent

#	Quick Takeaways	What to Do
1.	Always Listen	Pay close attention to her words and actions. If she says or shows hesitation, stops and reassesses the situation.
2.	Ask, Don't Assume	Never assume consent. A simple question like "Are you okay with this?" can clarify everything.
3.	Consent Is Ongoing	A "yes" once doesn't mean "yes" forever. Always check in, especially in new or changing situations.

4.	Respect “No” Without Pushback	If she says “No,” respect her decision without trying to pressure her. Accept it with open hands and let it be.
5.	Look for Enthusiasm	Consent should be given willingly and with enthusiasm, not out of hesitation. Both partners should feel eager and comfortable.
6.	Communicate Comfort Zones	Talk openly about boundaries and understand what feels okay for both of you.
7.	Create a Safe Space	Ensure she feels safe to express herself without fear of judgment or retaliation.

CHAPTER 5

Understanding Her Past

A woman is often more emotionally expressive than a man, sharing her fears, pain, and joy more openly. But that doesn't mean she's always understood. Her past, be it happy moments or painful scars that hurt like hell, shapes who she is today. It's the experiences she carries with her, the ones that moulded her dreams, her anxieties and how she approaches love.

Sharing what pained them isn't easy for anyone. Those are the memories she's guarded closely, the ones that still make her pause when brought to light. It takes courage to open up about those moments and even more to trust someone enough to let them in.

When you have a soft heart for her, when you want her to feel protected, understanding her past isn't about digging up old wounds or analysing her memory. It's about creating a safe space where she feels comfortable sharing what matters to her. Maybe she had a heartbreak that still leaves a shadow, or perhaps there's a childhood dream she's never spoken aloud.

Her past has no right to define her entirely, but it's a part of her story. A story you're now a part of. By understanding and respecting her, you show that you value every part of her, even those she might find difficult to share.

This chapter explores how understanding her past can deepen your connection, help you avoid misunderstandings, and build a love rooted in empathy and trust. When you accept her completely, her past and present, you build a future worth cherishing.

Learn From Her Experiences

Every experience she has lived through, whether joyful or painful, has shaped her into the person she is today. These experiences are not just parts of her past; they are keys to understanding her thought process and who she is now. When she opens up about them, it's a chance for you to connect on a deeper level and grow together.

Let's take an Example: Prachi once shared with Vishnu that in her previous relationship, she felt her opinions were always dismissed, leaving her doubting her worth. At first, Vishnu struggled to understand why Prachi sometimes thinks so much when expressing her thoughts. Frustration would creep in, and she occasionally thought to himself, why can't she just move on from it?

Then, one day, while reading an online newsletter titled "What are 5 Pitfalls to Avoid in a Relationship?" Vishnu realised something important. Prachi's past wasn't something to judge or dismiss; it was an opportunity to understand her better. He chose to stop reacting and started listening instead. When she hesitated to share her thoughts, he reassured her patiently, showing her that her voice mattered to him.

This shift turned a major point of conflict into an opportunity for growth. Prachi began to feel more confident, and their bond deepened because Vishnu learned to support her where she needed it most.

And here's a reminder for you, yes, you, Men: Don't judge her by the choices she made in her past. Every person, including you, has made mistakes. You've stumbled, you've fallen, and you've learned. Her past is no different. What matters is how she has grown from those experiences and how you support her journey moving forward. Her past isn't a barrier. It's a bridge. When you respect where she's been and learn how to walk alongside her, you create a relationship that values growth, respecting the past, understanding, and genuine love.

Supporting her without judgment transforms old wounds into shared healing and a deeper connection.

Addressing Her Fears and Triggers

Fears are invisible wounds, carried silently but felt deeply. They shape how someone navigates their life. For her, these fears might come from moments she had tried to bury, past heartbreaks, experiences, and betrayals that made her question her worth.

These aren't just memories; they're emotions that make her lose all her courage. Let's take Prachi as an example. She loves Vishnu deeply, but there are moments when a certain tone in his voice or a heated argument reminds her of a past relationship where her feelings were constantly dismissed. She doesn't always say it out loud, but her silence speaks volumes. One evening, Vishnu unintentionally raises his voice during a disagreement. Prachi goes quiet, pulling back and shutting herself off.

Vishnu notices and pauses. Instead of letting his frustration escalate, he softens his tone and says, "Prachi, did I upset you? Can we talk about it?" That simple acknowledgement of her feelings begins to dissolve the wall that her fear started to build. Addressing her fears doesn't mean you need to fix them or have all the answers. It means showing up. It's about you being there to talk through it. It might take time for her to open up, but it gives reassurance. It's also about understanding her triggers. Maybe she avoids certain places or withdraws after a rough day. Maybe she hesitates to share her opinions, fearing judgment or listening to "no". These moments aren't about her being difficult; they're her way of protecting herself from the pain she experienced before.

The key here is patience. When she pulls away, don't push. Instead, offer her your presence. Let her know she's not alone in her struggle. Sometimes, you just need to sit with her with a quiet reassurance like, "Take your time; I'm here when you're ready." This is all she needs.

Quick Takeaways: Building Trust Through Understanding

#	Quick Takeaways	What To Do
1.	Pay attention to her non-verbal cues.	Sometimes, her body language or silence speaks louder than her words.

		Observe and respond with care.
2.	Validate her feelings, even if you don't fully understand.	A simple "I hear you" or "That must have been hard" can make a world of difference.
3.	Let her open up at her own pace.	Avoid pressing her for details. Show patience, and she'll share when she's ready.
4.	Respect her boundaries without question.	If she says she's uncomfortable, honour it without pushing for explanations.
5.	Avoid assumptions about her past.	Ask instead of assuming. Judgment can break trust, but curiosity builds it.
6.	Share your own Vulnerabilities, too.	Opening up about your fears and past mistakes creates a safe space for her to do the same.

7.	Celebrate her growth, no matter how small.	Acknowledge the steps she takes to overcome her fears. It shows you're paying attention.
8.	Choose a safe word for tough conversations.	A pre-agreed word or phrase can help either of you pause an intense moment without feeling guilty.
9.	Respect the weight of her triggers.	If something upsets her, don't dismiss it as a minor issue. It's real to her, and that's what matters.
10.	Keep showing up.	Consistency builds trust. Be there for her, not just in words, but in actions every single day.

CHAPTER 6

The Danger of Judgment

Aren't we all humans? Making mistakes is a part of human nature; it's something we all experience. Yet, in relationships, judgment can feel like a weapon disguised as concern. When we hold someone's past against them, it doesn't just hurt them, but it also erodes the foundation of trust and love you've both built.

Imagine this: Prachi opens up to Vishnu about a mistake she made years ago, something she deeply regrets. Instead of listening with empathy, Vishnu lets his thoughts spiral. Why did she do that? Could I have trusted her then?

He doesn't say it aloud, but she can see the judgment in his eyes. Suddenly, she regrets sharing it. The wall between them grows taller, and what could've been a moment of vulnerability turns into a barrier between them.

Judgment doesn't just stop loving but also pushes it away. When you judge her past, you're telling her that her mistakes define her in your eyes and that she isn't allowed to grow beyond them. Let's not forget that you have made mistakes, too.

Now, let's flip the story: Imagine Vishnu listens without judgment. He hears her, acknowledges her courage in sharing, and says, "That must've been tough. I'm proud of how far you've come." In that moment, Prachi feels accepted and loved, not with her past casting a shadow, but with it embraced.

This chapter dives deep into the subtle ways judgment can creep into a relationship and how choosing empathy over criticism can transform your bond. Because when you accept someone's regrets, flaws and everything that person holds, you build a relationship with unconditional trust. That's the kind of love worth fighting for.

Why Judgment Pushes Her Away

Let's get real for a second, guys. When you judge her, whether it's her past, her choices or even those little mistakes she made, you're not just giving an option. You're telling her, "You're not good enough." And let me tell you, that cuts deep and pain like hell.

Imagine this: She finally gathers the courage to share something personal, something painful from her past. Instead of support, she gets a raised eyebrow or a comment like, "Why would you do that?" Now, how do you think that makes her feel? Hurt. Exposed. As if trusting you was a mistake.

Judgment doesn't just hurt her feelings; it pushes her away. It makes her question herself and wonder, "Why did I even share this? Does he really care about me?" She starts pulling back, not because she wants to, but because you made her feel unsafe.

Here's a wake-up call: Nobody's perfect. Not her. Not you. You've made mistakes, too, right? Done things you're not proud of? So why hold her to a standard you can't even meet?

It's more about showing up every day as her best friend. When she opens up, it's her way of saying, "I trust you." Honour that trust. She's not looking for a judge. She's looking for someone who gets her, who accepts her as she is, messy past and all. So the next time she shares, hold her hand instead of pointing a finger. Because when you do that, you're not just building a relationship but a safe space where love can grow.

How to Replace Criticism With Empathy

Let's imagine a moment with Vishnu and Prachi. It's been a long day, and Prachi, who had promised to cook dinner, ends up ordering takeout because she got caught up with work. When Vishnu walks in and sees the bags of food, he says, "Couldn't you even find time to cook? It's not that hard, Prachi."

Now, take a moment to understand what just happened here. That one comment hit her hard. She's tired, she's trying her best, and instead of feeling supported, she feels criticised.

What if Vishnu had reacted differently? Imagine him saying, "Looks like you had a really hectic day. Thank you for still making sure we had dinner sorted. Let's eat, and then I'll help clean up."

Can you feel the difference?

Here, empathy doesn't just change her day, but it deepens your connection. Criticism might seem insignificant to you, but for her, it can feel like she's not being appreciated. Instead of focusing on what she didn't do, take a moment to see things from her perspective. Maybe she's exhausted. Maybe she's juggling a lot. Maybe she just needs someone to say, "I am here with you."

The next time you feel the urge to criticise, pause and ask yourself: What's going on beneath this? Is she struggling? Is she overwhelmed? Replace criticism with kind words, a hug, or even a simple "I'm proud of you."

After a long day, all she wants is to come home to you, her safe place, someone who comforts her like nothing else. But if you spend that time criticising her, things will only get worse. You'll both end up feeling alone and more frustrated. Instead, show her empathy. Make her feel understood, valued, and loved. When you do that, you'll see her shine in ways you never imagined.

Empathy isn't about fixing everything. It's about showing up for her, letting her know she's not alone, and being the partner who lifts her up instead of tearing her down. That's how love grows.

Quick Takeaways: Breaking the Cycle of Judgment

#	Quick Takeaways	Actionable Steps
1.	Focus on the Present, Not the Past	When she shares something about her past, listen without judgment. Avoid bringing up past mistakes during disagreements. Let her know that you value who she is today.

2.	Ask Questions Instead of Assuming	If something bothers you, approach it with curiosity rather than criticism. Say, “Can you help me understand how you feel about this?” instead of jumping to conclusions.
3.	Celebrate Efforts, Not Perfection	Notice and appreciate the small things she does. For example, instead of pointing out what’s missing in her work, say, “I can see how much effort you’ve put into this; it’s so good!”

4.	Practice Pausing Before Reacting	When you feel the urge to judge, pause and take a breath. Ask yourself: Is this worth creating tension, or can I respond with kindness?
5.	Lead by Example	Be open about your own mistakes or vulnerabilities. When you show her that you don't judge yourself harshly, it creates a space where she feels safe doing the same.
6.	Use "I" Statements	Replace "You always..." with "I feel..." during conversations. This keeps the focus on your emotions and reduces the chance of her feeling attacked.
7.	Play a Judgment-Free Game	Have a fun evening in which you each share a quirky or embarrassing story and laugh about it together. This will build trust and show that it's okay to be imperfect.

8.	Remember Her Intentions	Instead of fixating on what went wrong, think about her intentions. Assume she meant well, even if the result wasn't perfect.

Don't Go to Sleep Without Solving a Fight

Fights are normal in any relationship, but what really tests your bond is how you handle them. Letting an argument carry over into the night might feel like the easier option, but it creates a gap that only grows with time. Imagine waking up the next day with unresolved tension. It's like a cloud hanging over both of you, affecting everything you do.

Even when you're upset, make an effort to connect before you sleep. It doesn't mean you have to agree on everything right away, but you can say, "I'm still upset, but I don't want us to end the day like this. Let's talk more tomorrow." It shows that you value the relationship more than the fight.

Arguments are temporary; the love you share is what matters in the long run. A little compromise and effort to clear the air before you sleep can go a long way in strengthening your bond. After all, isn't waking up next to someone you love without resentment worth it?

SECTION 3

Navigating Challenges Together

CHAPTER 7

Control and Dominance: A Relationship Killer

While I was in a long-distance relationship, I faced something I never thought would weigh me down— control disguised as care. The thing I feared the most was even casually talking to another girl, even if she was just a friend. I hesitated to respond to direct messages because she had access to all my social media passwords.

Here's the kicker: I never asked for hers, not even once. Yet, she would regularly log into my accounts and check every message. Slowly, this started to shrink my world. I stopped connecting with friends, avoided building my circle, and even stepped away from something I loved deeply: writing.

For months, I put my passion on hold, focusing entirely on her and trying to avoid anything that might upset her. But looking back, it feels like those were precious months wasted. What could I have achieved if I hadn't been so consumed by trying to meet unrealistic expectations? Maybe, just maybe, I would've been a bestselling author by now.

But that time has passed, and here I am, writing this book free, focused, and flying like a bird in an open sky. Will you help me turn this dream into reality and make this book a bestseller? I hope you're with me on this journey. Let's soar together.

No one likes to feel controlled. Whether it's about whom they talk to, where they go, or what they wear, being in a relationship should never mean losing your freedom with phrases like, "I just want what's best for you" or "I know what's right for us." While these words might seem harmless, they can make your partner feel small, unheard, and suffocated. Love isn't about owning someone; it's about trusting them, supporting their growth, and building a partnership based on mutual respect. When one partner tries to dominate or control the other, it doesn't create closeness, it further creates a wall between them.

Take a moment to reflect: Do you want your partner to stay with you because they feel trapped or because they genuinely want to be by your side?

In this chapter, we'll explore how control and dominance can slowly erode trust and love, why equality is the cornerstone of a healthy relationship, and how letting go of the need for control can strengthen your bond.

Why Equality Matters

Imagine this: You're walking on a bridge with your partner holding hands. The bridge is delicate, and you both need to step in sync to keep it from breaking. Now, if one of you starts rushing ahead, the balance is lost, and the bridge starts shaking. That's what happens in a relationship; without equality, it becomes unstable and hard to maintain. Equality isn't just about sharing responsibilities like paying bills or getting groceries; it's about treating each other equally in every sense. It's more about listening to each other's opinions, valuing each other's dreams, and making decisions together.

When one partner tries to assume they're always right or take control of their partner's life, it creates an imbalance. The other person might start feeling overlooked, restrained, or even frustrated. No one wants to feel like their voice doesn't matter.

Take Vishnu and Prachi, for example. Prachi wanted to start her own business, but Vishnu hesitated, worried about the time and effort it would take away from their relationship. Instead of shutting her idea down, he decided to listen, understand, and support her dreams. That's equality—not always agreeing but giving each other the respect and space to grow as individuals.

When a relationship is built on equality, it feels lighter. Both people are free to be themselves, knowing they're valued, supported, and respected.

It's no longer a tug-of-war; it's two people working side by side to build something beautiful together.

Letting Her Take Charge Without Losing Yourself

You know what? Relationships are a duet, not a solo show. Sometimes, that means stepping back and letting her lead. But here's the thing—letting her take charge doesn't mean you disappear or lose your place. It simply means you trust her to navigate certain moments while still being an active part of the journey.

Think of it like this: You and your partner are assembling a puzzle. She takes the lead in sorting out the corner pieces, setting the frame, and getting the groundwork done. But here, your role is equally important and crucial in finding the right pieces, filling the gaps, and offering encouragement when the picture isn't coming together as planned. Letting her take charge doesn't make you look like a shadow. Think about the bigger picture where you add value by building together.

For instance, maybe she's better at handling finances or planning your social calendar. Instead of feeling sidelined, be proud to have someone by your side who excels in these areas. While she leads, stay involved, ask questions, share your thoughts, and collaborate. It's not about one person making all the decisions; it's about working as a team where both voices matter.

When you allow her to shine in areas she's passionate about, you create space for mutual respect and growth. By being present and supportive, you ensure that letting her take charge isn't about giving up your say but about growing stronger as a couple.

Quick Takeaways: Building Respectful Dynamics

#	Quick Takeaways
1.	Ask for Her Opinion: Regularly seek her input when making decisions. It shows you value her opinion.

2.	Celebrate Her Wins: When she achieves something, big or small, cheer for her.
3.	Share Your Feelings: Open up about your own thoughts and feelings; vulnerability builds connection.
4.	Create Check-ins: Set aside time to check in with each other on how you're both feeling about the relationship.
5.	Respect Her Space: Understand when she needs space and when she wants your company, it's all about balance.
6.	Play Together: Try fun activities or games that foster teamwork and laughter, such as a cooking challenge.

CHAPTER 8

When Things Get Heated:

Navigating Conflicts

Every relationship will face its fair share of disagreements and heated moments. That's part of being human sometimes emotions get the best of us, and we say things we don't mean.

But how we handle those conflicts makes all the difference.

I remember, in my own relationship, when things got heated, my first instinct was to stay calm. When she would get upset, I'd focus on just listening. I didn't interrupt or immediately try to fix things. I allowed her to vent, to express her frustration, because sometimes all a person needs in a heated moment is to feel heard. When the storm had passed and we were both in a better place emotionally, I would talk to her calmly, explaining the impact of what she said and how it made me feel.

The key, I believe, was to never attack but instead to pinpoint what hurt me in a gentle, non-accusatory way. It was never about blaming; it was about helping her understand my side without making her feel down or worthless. There was no shame in the conversation, just mutual understanding. It's important to be mindful of the words we use because, in conflicts, we often say things we don't truly mean. Through all of this, I've always prided myself on having the ability to hold my tongue in the heat of the moment. I never let myself say something that would escalate the situation further because once words are out, they're hard to take back. Although it wasn't always easy, I realised that taking a step back before responding and calmly offering my perspective with respect helped us resolve our issues more effectively.

In this chapter, we'll explore healthy conflict management, staying calm when things get heated, communicating effectively during a disagreement, and why resolving conflict respectfully is essential to maintaining trust and understanding in a relationship.

After all, it's not about winning the argument but about building a stronger connection through the way we handle disagreements.

Calming Down and Communicating Effectively

When emotions run high in a relationship, it's easy to say things you might regret later. But the real way to resolve conflicts is knowing how to calm down and communicate effectively.

Here's something that worked for me: When a fight started to get intense, I knew I had to pause and take a step back. Instead of reacting right away, I would breathe and give myself a moment to cool off. In that space, I realised that reacting impulsively would only make things worse, so I focused on calming myself first.

Once I was calmer, I could listen to her without being defensive or feeling attacked. That's when real communication started. It's not just about waiting for your turn to speak; it's about hearing what the other person is saying and understanding their feelings. I made sure I wasn't just listening to her words but also trying to understand the emotions behind them.

When I did speak, I made an effort to express myself without blame. Instead of saying, "You did this" or "You always do that," I focused on saying how I felt, like "I felt hurt when this happened" or "It made me upset when I heard that." This way, she knew it was about how I was feeling, not about accusing her.

By focusing on calmness and expressing my emotions clearly, it became easier for both of us to get to the root of the problem and find a solution together. Communication isn't just about talking; it's more about creating a space where both partners feel heard, respected, and understood. In doing so, we built a stronger bond, even through our disagreements. This is the beauty of even disagreement, as well as communicating calmly.

Avoiding Text-Based Arguments

Text messages might seem like an easy way to communicate, but when it comes to conflict, they can do more harm than good. Seriously, I hate it when arguments happen over text; it's so frustrating! I've seen it happen time and time again, and it often leads to unnecessary pain and confusion. More than half of relationship problems today come from texting, and unfortunately, many couples end up hurt and in tears because of it.

Here's why: Texts are easily misinterpreted. Without being able to sense another person's tone or body language, it's almost impossible to understand the emotion behind the words. What you may intend as a simple comment could be read as an accusation, sarcasm, or something worse. Before you know it, what starts as a small disagreement turns into a full-blown argument.

For example, once Vishnu tried to explain how he felt via text, but because he was upset, he didn't choose his words carefully. Prachi interpreted it wrong and got hurt. What could've been a calm discussion turned into an emotional mess. This is why it's so essential to avoid texting during tense moments. I have seen that many people avoid listening during arguments, but they need to understand this little thing is creating a far greater wall between them.

Instead of diving into a text-based argument, pick up the phone or, even better, talk face-to-face. When we communicate directly, it helps clear up misunderstandings right away. You can hear each other's tone, see the facial expressions, and, most importantly, understand the intention behind the words. The vulnerability and connection that come with a real conversation can help you both work through the issue in a healthier way.

Trust me, if I could go back, I would have avoided so many text disagreements. Taking a moment to cool down and talking on call has saved me from so many misunderstandings. And it can save your relationship too.

Quick Takeaways: Resolving Conflicts With Maturity

Tip	Actionable Point	Fun Game to Resolve it
Pause and Cool Down	Take a break before talking about the issue to prevent things you might regret.	The Silent Challenge: Take 5-10 minutes of silence, then discuss calmly after both are ready.
Listen Actively	Listen attentively to what your partner says, and repeat what you have heard.	The Mirror Game: One partner talks, and the other repeats what they heard. This helps with clarity
Avoid Blame, Focus on Feelings	Express your feelings instead of making accusations.	Emotion show: Express your feelings without words, using only body language.
Stay Respectful	Don't use insults or sarcastic comments.	Compliment Game: After every point of conflict, both partners have to say something they appreciate about the other person.
Choose the Right Medium	Talk face-to-face or on the phone, not over text.	Guess the Tone: Text each other an important point and the other person guesses the tone. Discuss in person afterwards!

Look for Solutions, Not Victory	Work together to find a resolution, not to win the argument.	Solution Puzzle: Write down possible solutions on pieces of paper and work together to piece them together into a plan.

CHAPTER 9

Recognising Red Flags and Green Flags

Every relationship begins with a spark, a connection that makes everything feel exciting and cheery on the cake. But as time goes on, that initial excitement isn't always enough. What truly determines the health of a relationship are the signs we often overlook: the red flags and green flags.

Red flags are behaviours that signal something isn't quite right. They might not always be obvious, but they leave you with that uneasy feeling in your gut. It can be anything like your partner's way of dismissing your feelings, controlling your decision, or avoiding accountability. Ignoring these signs doesn't make them go away; instead, they tend to grow, creating cracks in the foundation of your precious bond.

On the flip side, green flags are the reassuring signs that tell you you're on the right track. It is what makes you feel at peace. It's when your partner supports your goals, communicates openly, and respects your boundaries. These are the main structural parts of trust and love, the things that make a relationship feel like home. Think of it this way: every relationship is a road trip. Red flags are like warning signs that the road ahead is broken or dangerous, while green flags are scenic views and smooth highways that make the journey worthwhile. Both are equally important to recognise as they guide you toward a healthier, more fulfilling connection.

In this chapter, we'll dive deep into what these flags look like, how to spot them early, and why it is crucial to act on what you see. By understanding these signals, you'll not only protect yourself from trauma but also open the door to a relationship where love and respect are the main pillars.

Identifying Signs of a Healthy Relationship

Imagine an old couple, Shivi and Kartik, sitting on a park bench, their hands intertwined, weathered but steady. They've been together for over 40 years, and their love still feels as fresh as when they were young and used to roam around streets holding hands. Their smiles reflect a lifetime of shared stories of struggles, joys and countless little victories that shaped their whole life.

When asked how they've managed to stay together for so long, Shivi laughs softly, "It wasn't always easy. But we learned to truly see and hear each other." Kartik adds, "We didn't just fall in love once; we kept choosing each other every day."

In their youth time, they were full of energy and excitement, but like any couple, they faced challenges. Shivi remembers a time when Kartik struggled with his career a lot while she worked long hours to support Kartik, to give him time to take care of his things, to set up his business. Even though Shivi was in the middle of her final CA exams, she made sure Kartik never noticed. Instead of growing apart, they leaned on each other. "I didn't feel alone in my struggles," Kartik says. "She made me feel like we were in it together."

Here are the lessons we can learn from Shivi and Kartik about identifying signs of a healthy relationship:

- Communication That Evolves Over Time: During their youth, Shivi and Kartik argued a lot, but as they grew together, they learned the art of listening, not just to reply but to understand. "We learned to say what we felt and not what we thought the other person wanted to hear," Shivi explains.
- Respect for Each Other's Individuality: Shivi loved gardening, while Kartik was passionate about music. Instead of forcing each other into the same interests, they supported one another. "I didn't need her to love my music," Kartik says. "I loved her joy when she found her passion."

- Trust That Stands the Test of Time: During the years Kartik had to travel for work, their trust in each other never wavered. “We never doubted each other’s commitment,” Shivi shares. “Trust is knowing you don’t need to check; you just feel secure.”
- Shared Efforts in Life’s Challenges: When Shivi faced health issues, Kartik was there by her side, cooking meals and handling chores. “He never made me feel like a burden,” Shivi recalls with gratitude.
- Growth Together While Growing Individually: They didn’t stop growing when they got married. Shivi pursued painting in her 50s, while Kartik learned to play musical instruments. “We encouraged each other to grow because that growth enriched our relationship,” Kartik says.

So here we can understand that love is what you make for your partner in everyday actions. A healthy relationship grows when both partners create a safe, trusting space where love can flourish, even in the simplest moments.

From the above love story, you all must have understood that this relationship isn’t just about chemistry; it’s about commitment, kindness, and the ability to adapt and grow together over time.

Understanding When to Step Away

Imagine you’re holding onto a rope. At first, it feels fine, just slightly comfortable. But the rope starts to fray and dig into your skin over time. You tighten your grip, hoping things will get better, but it only causes more pain. Letting go might feel scary, but sometimes, it’s the only way to stop the hurt and heal. Recognising when to step away is about realising that you deserve a relationship built on trust, respect and love. If these elements are missing despite your efforts, it’s okay to choose yourself.

Think of it this way: Walking away doesn’t mean you failed. It means you understand your worth and that staying in something unhealthy isn’t fair to either of you. A healthy love lifts you up; it doesn’t weigh you down.

Sometimes, Love isn't enough to make a relationship work. It's a tough realisation, but knowing when to step away can be one of the most loving things you can do for yourself.

In the end, stepping away might not be easy, but it can be the first step towards finding yourself, your true self, and the respect you deserve. And remember, Letting go doesn't erase the good memories; the moments you spend do stay with you, but it just opens the door to a better one ahead.

Quick Takeaways: Decoding the Signs

CHAPTER 10

What is a Situationship?

Back in my bachelor days, I had a friend who had an unusual arrangement with a guy. They weren't in a relationship, and they didn't talk daily. But whenever she needed something like a ride or some company, she'd call him, and he'd show up. After that, they'd go their separate ways until the next time. It wasn't a friendship, but it wasn't a relationship either. There were no labels, no commitments, just two people spending time together when it was suitable for them.

On the surface, it seemed sorted and convenient. But over time, crackas began to show. She started wanting more, a deeper connection and clarity about what they were. Meanwhile, he was content with keeping things casual.

This is what we call a situationship. It's that grey area where two people share a bond that's more than friendship but less than a committed relationship. It's undefined, flexible, and often temporary. Situationships have become increasingly common over the last few years. They can appear exciting initially because of the freedom and the lack of pressure. But they also come with their own set of challenges, like confusion, unmet expectations, and emotional stress. In this chapter, we'll explore what situationships are, why they happen, and how to recognise if you're in one. Whether they're right for you depends on what you're looking for and whether you are both on the same page.

How to Know if You're in a Situationship

Situationships exist in the grey area between friendship and a committed relationship, which can be confusing to navigate. They often lack the clarity and structure that define committed relationships, leaving you questioning where you stand. Let's dive deeper into the signs that can help you determine if you're in one.

- No Labels, Just Vibes: You've been spending time together for weeks or even months, but there's been no conversation about defining the relationship. When the topic comes up, it is usually sidelined with phrases like, "Let's just go with the flow" or "Why complicate things?" While this might feel free initially, it can lead to confusion and unmet expectations over time.
- Inconsistent Communication: Some days, you might talk nonstop, and others, it feels like you don't exist to them. There's no consistent effort to stay connected. Communication is often dictated by convenience rather than genuine care.
- Plans Are Last-Minute: Most of your time together is based on spontaneity. You rarely make plans in advance; instead, they text you at odd hours, asking if you're free to hang out. While this may seem exciting initially, it can feel dismissive and one-sided when you realise there's no real intention to prioritise you.
- No Long-Term Conversations: In a situationship, the focus is often on the present moment, with little to no discussion about the future. Whether it's planning a trip, attending an event together or talking about long-term goals, these conversations are mostly avoided. This can make it clear that one or both of you are not invested in building something lasting.
- Physical Intimacy Without Emotional Depth: While there might be a strong physical connection, emotional intimacy is often lacking. You may share intimate moments but find discussing personal fears, dreams, or vulnerabilities hard. This imbalance can leave you feeling unfulfilled over time.
- Unclear Expectations: One of the most defining traits of a situationship is the lack of clear boundaries or expectations. Neither of you knows what to expect from the other, and this can lead to misunderstandings. One person might be okay with the casual nature of the relationship, while the other silently hopes for more.

- Jealousy Without Commitment: Even though you're not officially a couple, feelings of jealousy or protectiveness might arise. However, these emotions are often kept bottled up because you feel like you don't have the "right" to express them. This dynamic can create frustration and emotional strain.
- Emotional Confusion: You find yourself wondering: Are we just friends? Are we more than that? Are we heading anywhere? This lack of clarity can leave you feeling emotionally drained, especially if you start to develop stronger feelings.

Here is an example to make this clearer:

You meet Unick at a friend's party. He's charming and funny, and you two hit it off instantly. Over the next few weeks, you start spending time together. You text often but not consistently. Some days, it feels like you're both inseparable and other days, you wonder if he even remembers you. One night, he surprises you by taking you to your favourite ice cream place, and it feels like something more. But you don't know what to say when your friends ask about your relationship status. "We're just hanging out," you reply, even though you're hoping for something deeper down. Now, fast-forward six months. The pattern hasn't changed. You're still spending time together but have no label, clarity, or idea of where this is going. Unick might genuinely enjoy your company, but his lack of commitment makes you feel stuck.

What can you do?

If these signs resonate with you, it's time to have an honest conversation both with yourself and the other person. Ask yourself:

- Am I okay with the uncertainty?
- What do I truly want from this relationship?
- Do I feel respected and valued in this dynamic?

Then, talk to them about your feelings. Be clear about what you want and listen to their perspective. Situationships aren't inherently bad; they can work if both people are on the same page. But if one of you wants more while the other prefers to keep things casual, it's your handmade recipe to get a severe headache.

The key is to prioritise your emotional well-being. Recognise your worth, and don't settle for something that leaves you feeling confused or undervalued.

Navigating the Confusion: Should You Stay or Go?

When you're in a situationship, feeling messed up is natural. One moment, you're caught up in the chemistry and the fun, and the next, you're questioning whether this is enough for you. Here, this lack of clarity can leave you feeling stuck, unsure of whether to hold on or walk away.

Ask yourself the hard questions. Start by reflecting on what you truly want.

Let's break it down in a way that helps you decide:

- Are you hoping this will evolve into a committed relationship?
- Does the other person show signs of wanting the same?
- How does this situationship make you feel - happy, fulfilled, or frustrated and confused?

If your answer leans more towards dissatisfaction, it's a sign that staying might not be the best choice for your emotional health.

- Look at Their Actions, Not Just Their Words: Sometimes, people in a situationship might give you mixed signals. They'll say things like, "I really like you, but I'm not ready for a relationship right now." Pay attention to their actions. Are they making an effort and trying to prioritise you, or are you always left feeling like an option? If you feel like their actions don't align with what you need, it's time to consider if this is the kind of thing you want to keep investing in.

- The Emotional Toll: Consider the impact this situationship has on your mental and emotional health. Are you constantly overthinking every interaction? Do you feel like you're always waiting for them to give you the validation you need? If the situationship is causing more stress and worries than joy, it's worth asking yourself if staying is worth the emotional toll.
- Weigh the Potential vs Reality: Now comes the what-ifs. What if they eventually want to commit? What if this turns into something real? But ask yourself: Are you holding on to the person they are today or the version of them you hope they'll become?

The Decision

Deciding whether to stay or go isn't easy, but it concludes with this:

- Does this situationship bring more joy or pain into your life?
- Are your needs and boundaries being respected?
- Can you see yourself thriving in this dynamic, or are you holding on out of fear of letting go?

In life, sometimes stepping away is the healthiest choice you can make, not because you don't care, but because you care about yourself enough to seek the love and clarity you deserve.

Quick Takeaways: Moving From a Situationship to a Real Relationship

Tip	Actionable Step
Acknowledge Your Feelings	Be honest about how you feel in the situation.

Stay Independent	Keep your personal growth and hobbies outside the relationship.
Evaluate Emotional Impact	Notice if the relationship makes you feel happy or drained.

CHAPTER 11

Is Your Man a Green Forest?

I imagine this: Vishnu and Prachi, after being together for a while, sit in their favourite cafe, sipping coffee. They've been through their fair share of ups and downs, but over time, their compatibility has only gotten better and stronger. Prachi gazes out the window at a passing car, where a young couple is enjoying ice cream together. She reminisces about the time when their relationship was just beginning. At first, it was easy to get lost in the excitement of it all—the messages, the phone calls, the late-night talks. But soon enough, she began to wonder, asking questions like, “Is he someone I can truly build a future with? Is he the kind of person who can help me grow, or will I feel stuck?”

She remembers how Vishnu would listen to her talk about her dreams and genuine interests, even when they were wild and ambiguous. He never shut her down. Instead, he encouraged her. “Go for it, Prachi. You'll never know unless you try. I believe in you,” he would say. Vishnu had his flaws. He struggled with his anger and sometimes let his emotions get the best of him, but he was also open about it. He worked on himself, not to be perfect, but to grow for both of them. Prachi could see that.

She reflected on something her mother had once told her. “A good man is like a green forest. He may not be perfect, but he provides you with the space to grow, the shelter to heal, and the strength to rise.”

Over time, Vishnu's actions proved just that. He wasn't perfect, but he was a partner who genuinely supported her. He encouraged her when she started writing her book, even when she doubted herself. When things were tough and Prachi was overwhelmed, he didn't try to control her. Instead, he listened, cared for her, and gave her space to breathe.

Vishnu was like that green forest, Prachi realised. His love wasn't about holding her back. He created a space where she could blossom, even in the most challenging moments. He helped her grow as an individual, just as she did for him. A relationship where instead of feeling confined or limited, you feel like you're both in a space that encourages you to do more, to push your limits, and that too with love. Just like a green forest, a man who supports you in this way is the one who will help you grow into the person you're meant to be.

How to Tell if He's Emotionally Available and Safe

It's important to feel secure with your partner, not only physically but emotionally, too. An emotionally available man creates a safe space, a cosy spot where you can share your thoughts, dreams, and fears without feeling judged. But how do you know if he's emotionally present and safe for you?

Start by noticing how he listens. It is crucial to find out for you, as this clarifies many things. When you talk about your feelings, does he make you feel heard, or does he let go of things with comments like, "You're overthinking."

When disagreements arise, does he remain calm and try to understand your perspective, "It's not a big deal?" An emotionally available man takes the time to listen truly, even when the conversation is tough.

For example, if you're upset about a bad day at work and vent to him, do what he says. "I'm sorry you had such a rough day. What can I do to help?" That's a sign he cares and wants to support you. On the other hand, if he immediately changes the topic or says, "Don't think much," or starts ranting about his day without considering your mood, it might show a lack of emotional availability. Another sign is how he handles conflict. When disagreements arise, does he remain calm and try to understand your perspective, or does he start shouting at you, blame you or walk away? A man who is emotionally safe doesn't make you feel guilty for having feelings. He does make sure to take conflicts as a chance to strengthen your bond, not as a chance to prove he's right.

Also, pay attention to how he shares his own emotions. Does he open up about his thoughts, fears, dreams, plans and struggles, or does he always keep things surface-level? Those who share openly with you are often more likely to create a connection based on trust and vulnerability. An emotionally safe man also respects your boundaries. He doesn't pressure you if you're not ready to share certain parts of your life. Instead, he gives you time and space to process and let your feelings process. He shows patience and understanding.

Ultimately, a partner who is emotionally available and safe makes you feel like you can be yourself without fear of being judged. He gives you the confidence to trust him wholeheartedly, knowing he will treat it with care.

What Makes Him the Right Partner for You

The right man for you will be someone who brings peace to your life, not chaos. He's the one who stands by you in your most challenging times, not just when everything is going well.

Ask yourself this: Does he make you feel safe, emotionally and physically? Can you trust him with your dreams, fears, and mistakes? Their way of not making you feel unworthy. Instead, he builds you up, supports your goal and celebrates every little achievement of yours as if they were his own.

Let's imagine a moment with Prachi and Vishnu. During one of Prachi's low days, she doubted her ability to succeed in her career. Vishnu didn't dismiss her concerns by giving hollow reassurances. Instead, he sat with her, helped her map out her goals, and reminded her of how capable she was and what she had planned, her dreams and her vision. You know, when your partner tries to uplift you, not by pretending problems don't exist, but by helping you face them with strength. The right man is also someone who shows up consistently. It's not about grand gestures all the time; it's about the daily efforts that show he cares. He'll check in with you, ask about your day, and take time to truly listen. If something's important to you, it becomes important to him because he values what makes you happy.

Moreover, the right partner is someone who doesn't shy away from difficult conversations. He's open to feedback, willing to apologise when he's wrong and works with you to find solutions instead of avoiding issues.

For example, he doesn't storm off or blame you if an argument arises. Instead, he takes the time to understand your feelings and work through the disagreement together. A good partner also values your independence. He doesn't feel threatened by your success or your friendships. Instead, he encourages you to pursue what makes you feel fulfilled, cheering for you every step of the way.

Ultimately, the right partner is someone who aligns with your values and helps create a relationship where you both feel respected, loved, and growing. It's not about perfection, it's about feeling like you're a team. Building something meaningful together.

He Apologises Sincerely He Supports Your Independence	When he makes a mistake, he takes responsibility without excuses and works to rebuild trust. He encourages you to follow your dreams, maintain friendships, and grow as an individual.
He Asks for Your Opinions	He values your input in decisions and makes you feel like an equal partner in the relationship.
He Makes You Feel Safe to Be Vulnerable	You can share your fears, insecurities, and dreams without feeling judged or ridiculed.

What Does Reassuring Really Mean?

Reassurance is not just about calming doubts; it's about making your partner feel secure and valued in the relationship. In moments of vulnerability or insecurity, a kind word or thoughtful action can mean the world. It's saying, "I see you, I understand, and I'm here for you."

Reassurance doesn't always need grand gestures. It's the small, consistent things that matter. When she's having a rough day and doubts herself, remind her of her strengths.

When she wonders if she's enough, tell her how much she means to you. When she questions the relationship, show her that she's a priority through your actions, not just words.

Remember, reassurance is about consistency. It's not just saying, "I love you" once and expecting that to be enough. It's about showing up, keeping your promises, and being a steady presence in her life. In a world full of uncertainties, be the one thing she knows she can count on.

SECTION 4

Sustaining Love and Connection

CHAPTER 12

Modern Masculinity: Her Wins Are Your Wins

Her victories, whether personal, professional, or emotional, are not a threat to your identity. They're an opportunity to grow together as a team. Now, those days are gone when a man's strength was measured by how much control he had or how he stood alone. True masculinity today is about the partnership, support, growing together and celebrating the success of the women you love.

Imagine this: Prachi gets a big promotion at work. She's thrilled, sharing her plans for the new role with Vishnu. Instead of feeling insecure, Vishnu smiles with pride and says, "I'm so proud of you. You deserve this." He knows her win doesn't take anything away from him. If anything, it strengthens their relationship, proving that they're equals who lift each other higher.

"You know how I feel? Supporting her makes me the happiest. When her mood isn't good, I deliver quick snacks like chocolates or surprise her with stuffed toys, and it instantly lights up her mood. Sometimes, I just stay on the call silently, simply staring at each other. These little things may sound 'eww' to some, but once you get into this zone, everything turns into an 'aww.'"

But too often, men feel pressured by outdated ideas of what it means to "be the man" in a relationship. Sometimes, they might feel jealous, insignificant, and even confused when their partner achieves something big. This chapter will help you break free from those old patterns and focus on making your relationship a healthier, more empowering version of masculinity, one where you both celebrate each other's wins, big or small.

"Because how you treat her shows how your parents raised you."

Redefining Masculinity in Today's World

Gautam and Henna had been together for three years. Henna was full of dreams and determination, working hard to make her mark in marketing. Gautam, on the other hand, was an author, pouring his heart into writing his third book, "How to Treat Her Right." Their worlds were different, but they found comfort and balance in each other. One evening, Henna came home bursting with excitement. "Gautam, I got it!" she said, her face glowing. She had just landed her dream project, a high-stakes marketing campaign for a global brand.

It was everything she had worked for, but it also meant late nights, endless travel, and an intense schedule.

As she shared her news, Henna's excitement faded away. "Do you think... this will pull us apart?" she asked, her voice uncertain.

Gautam looked at her; part of him felt uneasy. He had been hoping for more time together, especially as he was deep in writing the most emotionally challenging part of his book. But then, he realised something: this was her dream moment. And if anyone understood the importance of following a passion, it was him.

He smiled and took her hands in his. "Henna, this is huge. You've worked so hard for this, and I couldn't be prouder. Don't worry about us. We'll make it work."

Over the next few months, their dynamic shifted. Gautam adjusted his writing routine to spend more intentional moments with Henna. He often surprised her with coffee runs during her late-night work sessions or left sweet notes on her desk to remind her of his support. Even when he was buried in drafts and edits, he ensured Henna never felt alone in her journey. At the same time, Henna cheered for Gautam's work. She'd read chapters of his book and offer feedback, amazed by how much of their relationship had inspired his writing. She loved how he was using his words to help other men understand what it truly meant to support and cherish their partners.

Gautam realised something crucial during this time: being a supportive partner didn't diminish him; it made him stronger. Modern masculinity wasn't about control; It was about showing up, lifting each other, and celebrating success as a team. Henna's wins were his, too, just as her love inspired his words. They weren't just growing as individuals; they were growing together. In that, Gautam found the actual meaning of partnership: Love wasn't about keeping score; it was about playing for the same team.

Breaking Gender Stereotypes for a Stronger Relationship

Imagine this: Kartik loves cooking. It's his escape after a long day, a way to navigate his creativity. On the other hand, Shivi has a natural knack for fixing things around the house. Whether it's a leaky tap or assembling furniture, she enjoys getting her hands dirty. But when they first started living together, their families had a hard time understanding this dynamic.

"Kartik, why are you in the kitchen so much? Let Shivi handle it!" his mother would tease. Similarly, Shivi's friends would laugh, "You're doing all the repairs? Isn't that Kartik's job?"

At first, the comments made them second-guess their roles. Kartik wondered if he should step back from cooking, and Shivi felt awkward when people called her "too independent."

But they soon realised something important: Their relationship wasn't about fitting into boxes. It was about sharing responsibilities and being true to themselves.

One evening, while Kartik was preparing a hearty dinner and Shivi was fixing a broken chair, Kartik said, "Why does it matter who does what, as long as we're happy? You make things work with your tools, and I make magic with food. Isn't that our strength?"

Breaking gender stereotypes doesn't just liberate individuals; it strengthens relationships. When you let go of societal expectations about who "should" do what, you allow your bond to be defined by the partnership, not roles.

Ask yourself this: Why should love come with a rulebook? Why can't a man express vulnerability and a woman showcase strength?

In a truly equal relationship, you both have the freedom to be who you are without judgment or pressure. It's not about who earns more, who cooks, or who changes the lightbulb. It's about creating a space where both partners feel valued for their unique contributions.

By challenging traditional roles, you open the door to understanding and deeper respect. You make room for each other's passions and strengths, building a connection based on authenticity. Love isn't about being what the world expects. It's about being real with each other. That's where the magic lies. For Kartik and Shivi, the turning point wasn't just about ignoring what others thought. It was more about celebrating what made them unique as individuals as well as partners. You know, society tries to label you under their eyes like how they see you. Nowadays, people's mindsets are getting narrow in judging others, even though in their own lives, things aren't good because of them. Shivi dared to take on more challenging projects, and Kartik found joy in expanding his culinary skills. They even started teasing each other lovingly about their roles, with Shivi calling Kartik "Chef" and Kartik nicknaming Shivi "Toolbox Queen."

Now what? Here is the truth: When you break free from stereotypes, you don't just make your relationship stronger; you make it limitless. Don't be bound by roles defined by society; instead, become each other's biggest cheerleaders, pushing each other to achieve dreams and this hollow society once placed above you.

Let your relationship be an example of equality, authenticity, love, and being you, not of expectations and limitations.

The strongest connections are built on the freedom to be your authentic selves together.

Quick Takeaways: Supporting Her Success

Takeaway	Why it Matters	How to practice it
Celebrate Her Wins	Her success doesn't overshadow yours; it strengthens your bond.	Congratulate on her achievements, no matter how big or small. Take her out to celebrate or write her a note of pride.

Be Her Cheerleader, Not a Competitor	Relationships aren't a race; it's about teamwork.	Encourage her dreams and goals. Avoid comparisons and focus on building each other up.
Listen When She Shares Challenges	Sometimes, she just needs you to listen, not solve the problem.	Give her your full attention. Validate her feelings by saying, "That sounds tough. I'm here for you."
Recognise Effort, Not Just Outcomes	Acknowledge the hard work she puts in, even if things don't go as planned.	Say, "I saw how much effort you gave. That's inspiring." Show you value the process, not just the result.
Support Her Boundaries	Success often requires focus and balance. Respect her need for personal space or time.	If she's busy working, offer to handle a chore or give her quiet time to concentrate.
Collaborate on Shared Goals	Mutual support strengthens trust and partnership.	Plan ways to support each other's ambitions. For example, help her prepare for a presentation or ask for her input on your goals.
Celebrate Her Journey, Not Just	Every step forward deserves	After a tough day, surprise her with small gestures, like Milestones	acknowledgement, not just the destination.	her favourite coffee. It shows you're invested in her growth.

Be Proud of Her Without Reservation	Your pride in her success reflects your confidence in the relationship.	Share her achievements with friends and family, saying, "I'm so proud of what she's accomplished."
Never Diminish Her Efforts	Undermining her hard work can damage trust and emotional safety.	Avoid dismissive comments like, "That's not a big deal." Instead, show genuine interest in what she's doing.
Share the Spotlight	Her success doesn't diminish yours; it's something we can celebrate together.	Say, "I love how far you've come. You inspire me to work harder, too." Let her know she motivates you.

Reassurance and Vulnerability

If your man is crying in front of you, it's not a sign of weakness; it's a sign of trust. In a world that often tells men to "man up" and suppress their emotions, being vulnerable with someone takes incredible courage. It means he feels safe enough to let down his walls and share his fears, doubts, and struggles.

But let's be honest: Vulnerability isn't always easy to handle. Sometimes, we're not sure how to react when the person we see as strong is suddenly breaking down. The key is to remember that reassurance isn't about fixing everything. It's about being there, showing him that he's not alone, and letting him know it's okay to feel what he feels. When a man opens up, it's a rare glimpse into his world, a world that often hides pain and pressure under the surface. Your response in these moments can either strengthen the bond or make him retreat back into his shell. A simple "I'm here for you," or even a quiet presence by his side can mean more than a thousand words.

In this chapter, we'll explore why reassurance matters in a relationship, how vulnerability creates deeper connections, how it strengthens your ability to understand each other during misunderstandings, and why supporting each other emotionally is the foundation of true intimacy. Let's break the myth that men have to stay strong and embrace the truth that love grows strongest when both partners can be real with each other.

#Truth—I have cried in front of very few people. Most of them aren't with me now, but I value that moment when I let my emotions flow in front of them. Some left due to my mistakes, and others took me for granted.

Being There When She Needs You Most

It was 3:33 AM when Vishnu's phone buzzed quietly on the bedside table. Half-asleep, he reached for his glasses, fumbling to put them on as he saw the screen. It was Prachi. His heart sank. She never called this late unless something was really wrong.

"Hello?" he answered, his voice still heavy with sleep but full of concern.

All he could hear were her soft sobs. No words, just the kind of crying that spoke of deep hurt. He sat up straight, now wide awake. "Prachi, I'm here. What's wrong? Talk to me."

"I-I don't know," she said through broken breaths. "Everything just feels too much. I feel like I'm falling apart."

Vishnu didn't rush to speak or try to give quick fixes. He stayed quiet, letting her take her time. "I'm here," he said gently. "You don't have to explain everything right now. Just let it out."

She cried very long and hard. Vishnu stayed on the other end, listening without saying much. Sometimes, he'd whisper, "It's okay" or "I've got you," but mostly, he let her release what she was holding in. When her crying slowed, she began to talk. She shared how overwhelmed she felt by the pressure from work, expectations from family, and the fear of not being enough. Vishnu listened carefully, his chest tightening as he realised how much she had been keeping inside.

At one point, she said, "I must sound so silly right now. Why am I even calling and bothering you with this?"

Vishnu replied, "Don't ever say that," his voice steady. "You're not silly. You're just human. I'm so glad you called me. You don't have to carry all this alone. That's why I'm here, for moments like this."

She went silent for a few seconds as if his words had caught her off guard. "Do you really mean it?" she asked softly.

"Every single word," he said without hesitation. "You've been there for me so many times. How could I not be here for you? We're a team, Prachi. Whatever you're feeling, we'll figure it out together."

Her breathing started to slow, and her voice softened. “Thank you,” she said. “For just...being there.”

“Always,” Vishnu replied gently. “Now, tell me, what’s one thing we can do tomorrow to make things feel a little easier?” They spent the next hour talking about small steps, nothing big, just little things that might make her day brighter. By the time the call ended, the sun was starting to rise, and Prachi felt like she could finally breathe again.

Vishnu lay back down, tired but at peace. He hadn’t fixed all her problems, but he had done the most important thing: he had shown up for her when she needed him the most. Sometimes, just listening and letting someone know they’re not alone is the greatest act of love.

Sharing Your Own Vulnerabilities Without Fear

I shared things that I myself had never confronted. I told her everything about where I went wrong, the damage I caused, and how those mistakes left a mark on me. It wasn’t easy. My voice shook as I admitted the things I wasn’t proud of, the fears I kept hidden, and the moments I had failed not just others but myself. She didn’t interrupt. She didn’t judge. She just listened, her eyes soft and understanding. “Why didn’t you ever tell me this before?” she asked quietly.

“I was scared,” I replied. “Scared you’d see me differently. That you’d think I wasn’t strong enough or good enough to be the person you deserve.” But instead of pulling away, she leaned closer. “It takes so much strength to admit these things,” she said. “I don’t see you any differently. If anything, I respect you more for trusting me with this.”

That moment just vanished all my worries of fear, as vulnerability isn’t weakness. It’s the bridge that connects two hearts. When you share your struggles, fears, and regrets, it’s about the courage to confront her with your true feelings; it’s about allowing someone to know you truly. Sharing vulnerabilities is scary because it means showing the parts of you that aren’t perfect. But it’s also freeing. It says, “This is who I am, with all my flaws,” and trusts that the other person will still choose to stay. When I told her about my insecurities and the times I let myself down, it didn’t push her away. It brought us closer. She opened up about her own fears and mistakes, things she had never told anyone else. We didn’t just share stories; we shared trust.

If you're afraid to be vulnerable, remember this: The right person will never use your openness against you. They'll hold your fears as gently as they hold your hand. In those moments, the feelings you share and the talk you have build a connection that's built not on perfection but on truth. When you share your truth, you're not just asking someone to love you; you're giving them a chance to love all of you.

Quick Takeaways: Dealing With Vulnerabilities

Tip	Why It Matters
Acknowledge Your Emotions	Start by admitting to yourself how you feel. Naming your emotion whether it's fear, guilt, or sadness, helps you process and address them better.
Take a Breather Before Reacting	When emotions run high, step back for a moment. This pause can help you respond thoughtfully instead of reacting impulsively.
Talk It Out With Her	Share what's weighing on you with your partner. Sometimes, just saying it out loud helps ease the burden and brings you closer to finding a solution together.
Accept Imperfections	Understand that it's okay to have flaws or moments of weakness. This acceptance helps you deal with challenges without beating yourself up.
Focus on What You Can Control Lean on Your Partner's Support	Instead of stressing over things that you can't change, redirect your energy to the steps you can take to improve the situation. Don't hesitate to rely on your partner. Letting them know when you're struggling allows them to step in and show you that you're not alone in facing your battles.

Learn From Setbacks	When things don't go as planned, take it as a lesson. Reflecting on what went wrong helps you grow and prepares you for future challenges.
Stay Patient With Yourself	Dealing with vulnerabilities takes time. Be kind to yourself as you navigate through tough emotions, knowing that growth is a gradual process.

CHAPTER 14

Setting Clear Expectations

When I met her, I thought love would just work itself out. You know, the kind of fairytale where everything falls into place effortlessly.

We'd laugh at each other's jokes, hold hands under the stars, and somehow magically know what the other person needed. But life doesn't work like that, does it? There was this moment that stuck with me when she looked at me and said, "I need you to stop trying to fix everything. Sometimes, I just want you to listen." That hit me like a ton of bricks, not because I didn't care, but because I realised I'd been guessing at what she wanted instead of just asking or listening.

When I met her, I wanted to be her everything: her safe space, her rock, her partner in every sense. But I didn't realise that even the best intentions can alter without clarity. I thought I was doing enough just by being present, but there were so many little things I missed simply because we were together but weren't on the same page of knowing each other's expectations. Setting clear expectations isn't about making a rulebook for love or over-planning every moment. It's about understanding each other deeply. It's those honest conversations that happen after a fight, the late-night talks where you finally admit what you've been holding back, and those moments when you dare to ask, "What do you really need from me?"

Asking this seems scary, but it's also a way to get your answer and to calm the thoughts running through your head.

In this chapter, we'll explore how to shape a relationship for better or worse. You'll see why it's essential to voice your needs instead of waiting for them to get the “Harry Potter spell” to be understood magically. Whether it’s about handling conflicts, balancing priorities, or showing up for each other’s dreams, setting expectations isn’t about control. It’s about maintaining your connection because when both of you are clear about what you want and need, love stops feeling like a guessing game. It becomes a shared journey where you’re building something solid and lasting together.

Discussing Goals, Boundaries, and Terms of the Relationship

Jagriti always dreamed of finding a partner who would understand her passion and support her in achieving her dreams. She was working hard to pursue her (CA) qualification, and the journey was tough. Long study hours, challenging exams, and constant focus on her career path meant that sometimes, she couldn’t give her relationship the attention it deserved. But she also knew that being in a relationship required clear communication about her goals and boundaries.

Enter Aryan, her dream man. They met through a mutual friend at a gathering, and from the moment they started talking, they shared an instant connection. Aryan was supportive and understood her ambitions. He admired her dedication to her career and always made an effort to spend time with her, even if she was busy studying for her exams.

But Jagriti knew that for their relationship to grow, they needed to have a serious conversation about their future. She didn’t want to lose sight of her goals, and at the same time, she wanted to make sure that their relationship was on the right track.

One evening, after weeks of dating, they decided to meet at their favourite cafe. Jagriti took a deep breath and thought it was time to have the talk that had been on her mind for a while. “Aryan, I’ve really enjoyed spending time with you,” she said, trying to gather her thoughts. “But there are a few things I think we need to discuss. About our goals, boundaries, and what we both want from this relationship.”

Aryan looked at her with curiosity. “I’m listening, Jagriti. What’s on your mind?”

Jagriti hesitated but then spoke with honesty. “I’ve been thinking a lot about my career, and I want you to know how important it is to me.”

I'm really focused on my CA exams and the road ahead. Sometimes, I won't be able to hang out or talk as much, but that doesn't mean I don't care about you."

Aryan smiled softly. "I understand, Jagriti. I admire your courage, and I know how demanding your studies are. I'm not here to take away your focus; I just want to support you in whatever way I can."

Jagriti felt a weight lift off her shoulders. "Thank you, Aryan. That means a lot. I also want to ensure we're on the same page about what we're looking for in this relationship. I'm not just looking for something casual. I want something long-term, where we both have room to grow individually but also as a couple."

Aryan nodded with understanding. "I agree. I'm looking for something real, too, Jagriti. I think it's important for us both to grow in our careers and, at the same time, build something meaningful together. We need to support each other in our individual goals while also making time for each other."

Jagriti smiled, relieved that they both wanted the same thing. They spent the rest of the evening discussing their individual goals and how they could support each other along the way. Jagriti shared her ambition to become a successful CA, while Aryan spoke about his passion for his work in tech.

By the end of the conversation, Jagriti had realised how important it was to communicate openly about her boundaries and goals. In a relationship, both partners need to understand that there will be times when personal ambitions need to be prioritised, but that doesn't mean neglecting the relationship. It's about striking a balance between personal growth and nurturing love.

With clear communication and mutual support, Jagriti knew that both she and Aryan could continue to grow and chase their dreams while building a healthy, strong relationship together. Because when you set clear expectations from the start, it helps avoid misunderstandings and ensures both partners are on the same path, not just in love, but in life as well.

Avoiding False Hopes and Misunderstandings

One of the hardest things to navigate in any relationship is the space between expectations and reality. Sometimes, we might think we know what's going on, but without talking about it, we can end up hurt and build hopes that were never meant to be there in the first place.

Let me share a story that highlights how false hopes can grow from small misunderstandings.

Riya had been spending a lot of time with Sameer, a guy she met in college. They had great conversations, shared laughs, and had a great time together. The connection felt natural, it was like butterflies in my stomach. She started to imagine where this could go. Could this be the beginning of something serious? She started telling herself that they were on the same page, maybe even falling for each other. But Sameer, although he enjoyed Riya's Company, hadn't thought that far ahead. He was focused on his career and still figuring out what he wanted in a relationship. Whenever Riya asked if he saw a future with her, he'd brush it off, saying, "Let's just see where things go." For him, that wasn't an indication of how serious he was it was just his way of taking things slow.

One evening, Riya, feeling increasingly attached, decided to ask Sameer directly, "So, do you think we're heading towards something more serious? I really like you, and I just want to know where we stand."

Sameer looked at her, surprised by the question. "I'm having a great time with you, Riya," he said, "but I'm not really looking for anything serious right now. I think you're amazing, but I'm just not there yet."

Riya's heart dropped. She had built up so many expectations in her mind, thinking they were moving towards something deep. But the truth was, Sameer wasn't ready for the kind of relationship she imagined.

This happened because of a lack of communication. Riya started assuming things based on their time together, while Sameer hadn't set firm boundaries or shared his feelings openly.

What we can learn:

- Communicate Clearly: Openly express your intentions and discuss what you both want. If you're uncertain about the relationship's direction, don't hesitate to ask or share your own feelings. Avoid making assumptions about where things are headed.

- Avoid Assumptions: It's easy to believe that the other person feels the same way you do, but relationships flourish when there's mutual understanding. Ask questions to ensure you're on the same page if something feels unclear.
- Establish Boundaries Early: If you're not looking for something serious, say so from the beginning. Be upfront about your limits, allowing the other person to set realistic expectations. It might feel awkward, but honesty is a fair approach.
- Choose Honesty Over Silence: Avoiding difficult conversations to spare someone's feelings often causes more pain later. Being transparent about your emotions is healthier for both you and the other person in the long run.

In the end, the key to avoiding false hopes and misunderstandings is transparency. Relationships grow best when both partners are on the same page about their intentions, wants, and boundaries. It might be tough at first to clarify things in a straight way, but those honest conversations will save you from unnecessary heartbreak down the road.

Quick Takeaways: Building Transparency Together

Key Points	How to Apply Them
Be Clear About Intentions	Share your goals for the relationship early to avoid confusion or false expectations.
Set Healthy Boundaries	Talk about what's comfortable and acceptable for both of you to maintain respect.
Communicate Openly	Encourage honest conversations about feelings, goals, and concerns.

Match Words with Actions	Ensure your actions align with what you say to build trust and reliability.
Check-in Regularly	Periodically discuss how things are going to stay on the same page.

Respecting Her Choices

Respecting her choices is not just about letting her do what she wants; it's about showing that you trust her judgment and value her independence. Whether it's about her career, friendships, or personal decisions, she deserves the space to make her own calls without unnecessary interference or judgment.

For example, if she decides to pursue a challenging career path, support her instead of questioning her ability to handle it. If she wants to spend time with her friends or take a solo trip, trust her intentions and don't let insecurities cloud your judgment.

Respecting her choices doesn't mean you can't have your opinions or concerns, but it's about how you communicate them. Speak with kindness and listen with an open mind. Trust and respect are the foundation of any healthy relationship, and when you honour her individuality, you're building a stronger connection.

SECTION 5

Practical Steps for a Deeper Connection

CHAPTER 15

How to Make Her Feel Special

Making her feel special is about the little things that show her that she matters to you. It's about paying attention to what makes her smile, what makes her feel loved, and showing that you see her for who she truly is.

Think about it: When was the last time you complimented her, not just on her looks but on her personality, her efforts, or the way she makes your life brighter? Small moments of appreciation can make a big difference for her. Whether remembering her favourite snack, texting her a random "I'm proud of you," or just listening to her talk about her day with genuine interest, these things make her feel seen and valued. Love is in the details which you share with her about your day, what you have done and how you are actually doing, and it's those details that leave a lasting impact.

In this chapter, we'll explore how to create those meaningful moments, nurture her heart, and remind her every day why she's so important to you. Because when you make her feel special, you're not just loving her, you're building a bond that grows stronger with time.

From Talking to Experiences

"I told her we would experience it together, and we did. What I said, I made sure to fulfil it." It was a simple promise but carried so much meaning. We decided to explore things together, to not just dream about the future but actually live those dreams. Whether it was as small as trying her favourite street food. While I love spicy food, she prefers milder masalas, but I haven't shared this with her. We also made the trip she had always talked about.

One day, she told me how much she loved sunsets. So, we planned to watch one in the evening. But it wasn't just about sitting there and watching the sky turn orange like magic. It was about the conversations we had while waiting, the laughs we shared when we struggled to find the perfect spot, and the quiet moments of just being present with each other, looking and smiling, and being happy internally.

These experiences weren't always perfectly planned. Sometimes, it was about trying new things spontaneously, like cooking a meal together and laughing at how bad it turned out. Other times, it was about doing something she loved that I'd never done before, like dancing, even though I had feared dancing. When you take what you've talked about and turn it into shared experiences, it creates a bond that words alone can't achieve. It shows her that your promises aren't just empty words but backed by action. These action-backed promises are what make you a gentleman. And these moments, big or small, become memories that she'll carry in her heart forever.

Love isn't just about saying, "I'll be there"; it's about actually showing up and living those moments hand in hand. That's what turns ordinary relationships into extraordinary ones.

Celebrating Small Moments, Not Just Big Occasions [Instagram Live Starts]

Gautam: Hey, everyone! Welcome to today's live session. You know, we always talk about celebrating anniversaries or big milestones, but what about the little moments? That's what we're diving into today. And joining me is Vaishi, someone who always has the most heartfelt takes on relationships. Hey Vaishu!

Vaishi: Hi, Gautam! Hi, everyone! I'm so excited about this topic because it's something I personally live by. Let's do this!

Gautam: All right, so I need to tell you something funny first. Yesterday, I asked people to share the smallest thing their partner did that made their day. Someone said, “My partner saved me the last slice of pizza.” I mean, come on! It’s just pizza, right?

Vaishi (laughs): But see, that’s the magic! It’s not just pizza. It’s about the thought behind it. Saving that slice says, “I’m thinking about you even in this tiny moment.” Small acts like that mean so much.

Gautam: Okay, you’ve got me there. But let’s get real: “Why do you think most of us overlook these little moments?”

Vaishi: Honestly, Gautam, it’s because we’ve been conditioned to think love is about grand gestures. Movies and social media all show love as these big, dramatic events. But the truth is, real love, happens in the quiet, everyday moments.

Gautam: That’s true. You know, it reminds me of something personal. A few years back, I was working late on a book deadline. I was completely stressed, and my head was a mess. Out of nowhere, my partner texted me, “You’re amazing, and I know you’ll finish this.” It wasn’t a big declaration or anything, but that one text calmed me instantly. I felt seen and supported.

Vaishi: Exactly! Those are the moments that build a relationship. They don’t cost anything, but they’re priceless.

Gautam: What about you, Vaishu? Do you have a story like that? Something small that left a big impact?

Vaishi: Oh, absolutely! There was this one time, years ago, when I had an awful day at work. I came home exhausted, and I just didn’t want to talk to anyone. My partner noticed, and instead of asking a million questions, he quietly ordered my favourite dessert and sat beside me. We didn’t even talk much that night, but that gesture said, “I’m here for you, no matter what.” I still think about that.

Gautam: Wow, that’s beautiful. So, here’s a tricky question: What do you say to someone who thinks small moments aren’t enough? Like, “Oh, we need a big vacation to fix things.”

Vaishi: Honestly, Gautam, if a relationship is struggling, a vacation won’t fix it. It’s the little things that hold you together during tough times. If you can't find joy in everyday moments, then the big ones won't feel as meaningful either.

Gautam: Totally agree. So, let's flip it: how can someone start celebrating small moments if they're not used to them?

Vaishi: It's simple: Pay attention. Notice the effort your partner puts in, no matter how small, and show gratitude. It could be as little as saying, "Thank you for folding the laundry," or, "I love how you make me laugh after a hard day." Once you start noticing, it becomes second nature.

Gautam: One last thing before we wrap up. What's the smallest, sweetest gesture you've ever done for someone, Vaishu?

Vaishi: Oh, that's easy. Once, my partner had a terrible cold, and he kept talking about this childhood memory of his mom making ginger tea for him. So, I looked up the recipe, made it for him, and gave it to him without saying a word. The way his face lit up, I'll never forget it.

Gautam: That's amazing! All right, everyone, you heard it here. Love isn't about waiting for grand gestures; it's about finding joy in everyday moments. Go out there and celebrate something small today.

CHAPTER 16

Dealing With Insecurities Together

I just wanted to stay updated, to know if she's okay, if she's reached home safely, or simply how she's doing. It's not about controlling her or taking away her freedom. I would never want to clip her wings or stop her from soaring in the open sky. That's not who I am. Her past experiences have been like a roller-coaster ride: rough, unpredictable, and sometimes hurtful. Those experiences have shaped her in ways that make her guarded, and I understand that. Now that I'm here, ready to accept all of her flaws, insecurities, weaknesses, and strengths. I want her to know that she doesn't have to change for me. That wouldn't be right. The person she is today is someone I deeply appreciate, and I want us to think about building a future together where we support each other professionally and find comfort in our personal moments. She's so sweet, you know. When I first met her, she wasn't feeling great. That first night, we talked until 3:33 a.m. without even realising it, and somehow, that time became "our number." It's a small thing, but it holds so much meaning for us.

Just the other night, I called her to check if she'd reached home safely. Her response caught me off guard. She said, "I can't update you on every single thing I do." It stung deeply. I wasn't trying to control her or invade her space; I just wanted to know she was safe. I quietly said, "You should sleep. Good night."

A minute later, I got a voice note from her. "I'm sorry," she said. "I'm feeling irritated because of constant work and everything going on. I don't feel like updating every detail of my day. Some things should just stay with me." I understood her point, but it still hurt. All I wanted was to know she was safe. That night, I didn't call her again. To my surprise, she didn't call me either that night, not the next morning. It hurt even more. Later, we exchanged a few messages, but I couldn't stop wondering why she hadn't reached out.

The next morning, I finally called her. We talked for 15 minutes. Was I angry? No. Was I hurt? Yes, a little. But my intention has always been to help her heal in every way I can. She's been through relationships that made her feel less than she deserves, and I want to change that for her.

Her insecurities revolve around her freedom and her choices. I respect that. I'm not here to take anything from her but only to give. But when insecurities meet unclear communication, misunderstandings can arise. If we had calmly shared our feelings at that moment, things might have played out differently.

This chapter is about those moments. It's about navigating insecurities together, respecting each other's boundaries, and understanding that healing takes time and effort from both sides.

Let's dive deeper into how insecurities, when handled with care and love, can bring people closer rather than push them apart.

Addressing Both Sides of the Equation

In any relationship, insecurities are not one-sided. Both partners carry their own fears, doubts, and past experiences into the bond. It's not just about fixing her insecurities or yours. It's about understanding that both of you have emotional needs and figuring out how to meet them together.

Let me paint a picture: Imagine a seesaw. If only one person works to keep the balance, it won't work. But if both lean in, communicating and supporting each other, it stays steady. That's what addressing both sides looks like in a relationship. For example, if she's worried about losing her independence, you might feel she's pulling away from you. Both feelings are valid. Instead of letting those fears build a wall, talk about them openly. Share your concerns without blaming or pointing fingers. Say things like, “I know your freedom matters to you, and I respect that. At the same time, I need to feel connected to you. How can we make this work for both of us?” And when it’s your turn, don’t hesitate to open up about what makes you feel vulnerable. Maybe you’re scared of being left out or not being enough. Express it honestly: “Sometimes I feel like I’m not doing enough to support you. I just want you to know I’m here for you.”

Addressing insecurities isn’t about fixing the other person. It’s about meeting each other halfway and being willing to listen without judgment. When both of you take responsibility for your own emotions and also care about others, that’s when real growth happens. At the end of the day, love is a partnership. It’s not about one person carrying the weight of the relationship. It’s about both of you finding strength in each other to face your insecurities and overcome them together.

Building Confidence Without Judgment

After that difficult night, where our conversation ended with her voice note, I sat down to think deeply about what had happened. I asked myself: How can I help her feel more confident without making her feel judged? How can I let her know that I’m here to support her, not control her?

The next day, I decided to approach things differently. I sent her an 8-minute voice note since her birthday was coming up. I wanted to balance my mood to make her feel good and special, as it was a significant day for me, too. I also ordered a cake and some chocolates.

She was busy when I sent the voice note, and I told her to listen to it. However, she replied, “I want to listen to it calmly. Let me sit peacefully, and then I will listen.” She was at the office when I sent it. I waited, but the day changed, and now it was her birthday. She finally listened to the voice note during the day, almost a day later.

And this is what she texted me back, “This was genuinely a very relaxing audio. It felt so good.”

CHAPTER 17

Long-Distance Relationships

I had been in a long-distance relationship, and let me tell you, it wasn't easy. There were days when I just wanted to be there with her, hold her hand, look into her eyes, and have those silly little fights in person instead of over a call. The distance sometimes felt like a wall, a never-ending reminder of how far apart we were. But then, it also taught me so much about love, patience, and trust. Every call became special, every text felt like a thread connecting us, and every time we planned to meet, it was like waiting for a festival. Every call became special, every text felt like a thread connecting us, and every time we planned to meet, it was like waiting for a festival. But long-distance relationships test your bond in ways you can't imagine in your life. They force you to communicate better, to trust more, and to appreciate the person even when they're not physically present. It's not about how often you talk but how deeply you connect.

There were nights when I'd stare at my phone, waiting for her call or her message, just to know she was thinking about me. There were days when I felt like the distance was stealing moments we could have shared, celebrating milestones, supporting each other during tough times, or simply sitting together in comforting silence. The hardest part wasn't just the physical distance; it was the emotional one that sometimes crept in. Misunderstandings over texts and unanswered calls, and this thing can test your bond and this wait to know about their day can test your patience. But through it all, I realised something: Love isn't about the proximity of bodies, it's about the connection of souls.

Every message we sent, every video call we made, and every visit we planned was a reminder that we were willing to put in the effort. We celebrated the small things like a random "I miss you" text, a surprise delivery of food to each other's doorsteps, and even shared sunsets through photos. These gestures, though simple, kept our bond alive.

In this chapter, we'll dive deep into what it takes to make a long-distance relationship work, but here I am telling you, it does take a lot of forgiveness and patience. From managing misunderstandings and maintaining trust to creating moments that feel intimate even from miles away, we'll explore how love can thrive despite the challenges. Because when two people truly care, distance is just a test of how far love can stretch and love if nurtured well, has no limits.

Communication, Safety, and Consistency

What does it take to make your long-distance relationship work? It's not just love alone; it's the efforts to stay connected even after being miles away, the assurance of trust, and the steady rhythm of showing up for each other. Let's talk about communication first. In a long-distance relationship, words are everything. A simple "good morning" or "good night" can mean the world. But it's not just about frequent texts or calls; it's about meaningful ones. Ask how their day went, share your own, and don't shy away from talking about your feelings. The glue that sticks you both together during a long-distance relationship is honest and open communication.

Safety is important and includes both physical and emotional aspects. This text focuses on emotional safety in a partnership. When you're miles apart, insecurities can arise for sure. Maybe they didn't reply for hours, or you saw them tagged in a picture with someone else. It's easy to let your mind wander, but instead of assuming the worst, trust them. And if something bothers you, talk about it calmly. Creating a space where both of you feel secure and understood is essential.

Yes, I agree that trusting someone repeatedly, especially from miles away, can feel very challenging. However, this is where believing in yourself and the bond you share becomes essential. If you communicate calmly and ask questions in a normal, considerate tone, they are likely to respond similarly. On the other hand, if your tone is high, whether intentionally or accidentally, it may lead to misunderstandings, which can be difficult to resolve.

Instead of being overly attached or defensive, allow them to approach the situation in their own comfort zone. Let them open up and talk about things naturally. You can send thoughtful texts, voice notes, or even record a short video of yourself for them while they are sleeping. This gesture is not only cute but also heartwarming. When your partner notices this effort, it can make them genuinely happy, encouraging them to invest even more emotionally in your relationship. It strengthens the bond and gives them more reasons to keep nurturing the connection you share.

Then there's consistency. This doesn't mean you have to be glued to your phone 24/7. It's about keeping promises and being reliable. If you say, you'll call at a certain time, follow through. If you plan a visit, stick to it. Being consistent shows that you value the relationship and are committed to making it work.

Long-distance relationships grow when both people feel heard, safe, and important. So, focus on building these pillars. It might not always be easy, but when you both put in the effort, the distance becomes just a small detail in a much bigger, beautiful story.

Avoiding Common Pitfalls of Distance

[Scene: A late-night phone call between Devansh and Goyii, a couple in a long-distance relationship.]

Devansh: Hey, Goyii, you sounded a bit down earlier. Is everything okay?

Goyii (sighs): Honestly, Devansh, I've been feeling... distant, you know? Like we're drifting apart a little.

Devansh: Oh no, Goyii. I didn't realise you were feeling this way. What's been bothering you the most?

Goyii: I guess it's just that our conversations feel so routine lately. It's all about what we're doing and where we're going; there's no spark anymore. I miss how we used to laugh for hours about nothing.

Devansh: You're right. We've fallen into a cycle of just sharing updates. How about we shake things up? This Friday, let's plan a virtual date night. We'll cook the same meal and watch a movie together, just like we used to.

Goyii: That sounds nice. But... there's another thing. Sometimes I feel like I'm the only one making an effort to keep this going. It makes me wonder if you're still as invested as I am.

Devansh: Oh, Goyii. I didn't mean to make you feel like that. Work has been crazy, but that's no excuse. Let's set a time every day to talk, something we both stick to, no matter what. Even if it's just 15 minutes.

Goyii: That would help a lot. But Devansh... can I ask you something? Do you ever feel like the distance could lead to doubts, like... maybe one of us will grow apart?

Devansh: Honestly, distance is hard, Goyii. But I've never doubted us, not once. And if anything ever makes you feel unsure, promise me you'll tell me. We've made it this far because we trust each other.

Goyii: I promise. Thank you for saying that. I'll work on being more open too, instead of letting things build up.

Devansh: That's all I need, Goyii. We're in this together. Distance doesn't have to break us. It's just a challenge we'll overcome, one day at a time.

Goyii: Okay, team effort. And about that virtual date, don't forget the dessert this time, mister!

Devansh: (laughing) Dessert? Done. But only if you pick the movie. Deal?

Goyii: Deal done, bachhe!

Takeaway: Conversations like these keep long-distance relationships healthy. Devansh and Goyii's open dialogue shows the importance of addressing feelings, making mutual efforts, and maintaining trust. It's not always easy, but with love and teamwork, even miles apart, they stay close at heart.

Being Present in the Small Moments

Life is made up of small moments, and sometimes, those moments matter more than the big events. Love isn’t just about grand romantic gestures; it’s about showing up every day in ways that make her feel cherished.

It could be as simple as remembering how she likes her coffee or taking a few minutes to ask about her day, even when you’re busy. It’s holding her hand during a walk, laughing over silly jokes, or sitting in comfortable silence together.

When you focus on being present in these little moments, you show her that she matters to you, not just when it’s convenient or when there’s something to celebrate, but always. These everyday acts of love create a bond that no special occasion can replicate.

SECTION 6

Growth Beyond the Relationship

CHAPTER 18

The Value of Hard Conversations

There is something about hard conversations that make us want to avoid them. It's easier to keep things smooth and comfortable, but the truth is, those uncomfortable talks are often the ones that make a relationship stronger. I remember when Ojas, my close friend Deepak and I had to have one of those conversations.

We were hanging out one evening, just talking like we always did, when something serious came up. It was about an argument we had a few days earlier, something I had been holding onto because I didn't want to rock the boat. But that night, I realised avoiding it was only making things worse. I could tell Deepak felt it, too, though neither of us had said anything yet. It was clear that both of us were holding back, unsure about how to approach the topic. We sat in silence for a moment, and then I just said, "Deepak, I think we need to talk about what happened." His face tensed up a bit, and I could see that he was thinking about how to respond. But we both knew that it was time. No matter how difficult, having this conversation would help us grow, both individually and in our friendship.

As the silence stayed between us, I could feel the weight of unspoken words hanging in the air. Deepak was always the type to avoid conflict. Just like me. We were both trying to figure out how to bring up the topic without making things worse. But after a few moments of hesitation, I knew we had no choice but to face it.

"Deepak," I said, my voice calm but filled with uncertainty, "I don't want to leave this unspoken any longer. We need to talk about that argument. It's been making me anxious, and I can sense it's bothering you, too."

Deepak looked at me, his eyes softening a little as if he was relieved I said it first. He let out a long breath and nodded. "You're right, Ojas. I've been thinking about it, too. But, honestly, I didn't know how to bring it up. I didn't want to make things awkward or make you feel like I was blaming you." I appreciated his honesty, and it made me realise something important. Sometimes, we avoid tough talks because we're afraid of hurting the other person or creating distance. But in reality, not talking about it only pushes us further apart. We both knew that this conversation, no matter how hard it was, would clear the air.

We went on to discuss the misunderstanding that had caused the break between us. It wasn't about who was right or wrong; it was more about understanding each other's perspectives and communicating better, as sometimes even a little back-and-forth of words can make things worse. By the end of it, we weren't just relieved; we were closer, stronger, and more connected than before.

It's easy to avoid the difficult stuff, but addressing them head-on is what pushes you towards growth. Whether with friends, partners, or even family, these conversations show that you care enough to work through the tough moments. It's my experience that it is what makes you and people build trust, respect, and emotional and mental safety. And that's what this chapter is about: the power of tough conversations. These talks might not always be easy, but they are essential. Whether it's about misunderstandings, setting boundaries, or addressing something that's bothering you, having these hard conversations creates a deeper level of trust, respect, and understanding.

So, let's dive into why these conversations matter, how to navigate them, and how they can ultimately make your relationships stronger.

Discussing Difficult Topics Without Fear

Vishnu and Prachi had been dating for a while, and things were going well until one evening when a small misunderstanding turned into something bigger. Prachi had been feeling a bit ignored lately. Vishnu had been spending a lot of time working on his latest book, and while he was always kind and attentive, Prachi felt like she wasn't getting enough of his time. One evening, while they sat together after dinner, Prachi decided it was time to bring it up. She had been thinking about it for days, unsure how Vishnu would react. But she knew that if they were to move forward, they needed to talk about it.

"Vishnu, can I tell you something that's been on my mind?"

Prachi asked, nervously tapping her fingers on the table.

Vishnu looked up from his phone and smiled, putting it aside. "Of course, Prachi. What's going on?"

"I've been feeling a little left out lately," she said, her voice soft but clear. "I know you're busy with your book, but I miss spending time with you. It feels like I'm always waiting for you to finish working."

Vishnu immediately felt a pang of guilt. He hadn't realised how much his work was affecting her. His initial reaction was to apologise, but instead, he took a deep breath and tried to listen without jumping to conclusions.

"I'm really sorry, Prachi," he said sincerely. "I didn't know you were feeling this way. I've been so caught up with the book that I didn't realise how much it was taking me away from you."

Prachi nodded, appreciating his honesty. "I understand that your book is important, and I support you, but sometimes it feels like I'm not a priority."

There was silence as Vishnu processed her words. This wasn't their first time having faced a difficult conversation, but it was different. He wasn't just apologising to improve things; he was genuinely trying to understand her perspective.

"Thank you for telling me this, Prachi," Vishnu said after a moment. "I didn't mean to make you feel unimportant. I've been so focused on finishing this book that I lost sight of how important our time together is." He then added, "Let's figure out a way to make more time for us. I don't want you to feel like you're just waiting around for me."

Prachi smiled, feeling a weight lift off her chest. "I appreciate that, Vishnu. I just want us to be able to talk and spend time together without feeling like I'm competing for your attention." From that moment on, they both made a conscious effort to communicate better. They started setting aside specific times during the week to spend together, whether it was a quiet evening or a fun day out. They also talked about their feelings more openly, without fear of making things worse. They knew that the best relationships are built on honest communication, even when it's tough.

In their case, facing the uncomfortable truth and talking it through only made their bond stronger. It was a reminder that love isn't just about the good times; it's about being there for each other, especially when things aren't perfect.

Key Takeaways from Vishnu and Prachi's Story:

1. It's okay to speak up: If something is bothering you, it's better to talk about it than to keep it inside.
2. Be open and honest: Sharing your feelings can be uncomfortable, but it's the first step toward resolving the issue.
3. Listen actively: Make sure to listen to your partner's perspective without getting defensive.
4. Work together to find solutions: Rather than blaming each other, work as a team to find ways to improve the situation.
5. Keep the communication going: Difficult conversations should be ongoing. They help build trust and understanding in the relationship.

Vishnu and Prachi's story is a reminder that addressing tough topics is essential in any relationship. It's not about avoiding conflicts but about working through them with honesty, love, and understanding.

Setting Common Goals and Finding Middle Ground

In today's world, where everything seems to move so quickly, relationships often follow the same pattern. The focus shifts to keeping up with the pace, leaving little time to build meaningful connections. Instead of letting emotional and mental bonds grow naturally, people often rush through the early stages, missing the chance to create a solid foundation of trust and understanding that's essential for lasting relationships. But here's the truth: relationships are not something you can just use and throw away. They are not disposable items. They need care, effort, and time.

If you're someone who's starting to understand yourself better and becoming more aware of what you want, this is for you. A strong relationship isn't just about having fun in the moment and just chilling out; it's about working together, setting shared goals, and building something meaningful that benefits both of you. Think about it: If you and your partner are always pulling in different directions, it's going to be hard to move forward, as there will always be conflicts.

But if you take the time to sit down, talk, and figure out what both of you want, whether it's about your career, family, or the future, you'll find ways to align. It doesn't mean you must agree on everything, but finding a middle ground can make all the difference.

For example, let's say one of you wants to move to a big city for work while the other prefers staying close to family. Instead of arguing, take the time to understand each other's reasons. Maybe there's a way to meet halfway, like considering cities that aren't too far from family but still offer career opportunities. Relationships aren't perfect, and they won't always be easy. But when you set common goals and work together to find solutions, you'll feel closer, more connected, and more like a team, where you are playing together for one goal, not competing with others. It's about investing in each other and creating a bond that stands strong, even when life gets tough.

So, remember: Give your relationship the time and effort it deserves to understand each other better with each passing day. It's not about rushing to the finish line but about enjoying the journey together.

Quick Takeaways: The Hard Talks

Points	Why It Matters	How To Do It
Start With a Question and Not a Statement	Opens conversations without making the other person feel attacked.	Ask, "How do you feel about this?" instead of assuming or accusing.
Pause and Listen	Makes the other person feel heard and	Let them speak fully before responding.

	valued.
Speak About Feelings, Not Blame	Keeps the tone softer and more productive	Use “I feel” statements, like “I felt hurt when...”
Choose the Right Time and Place	A relaxed setting can lead to better understanding.	Avoid talking during stressful moments. Pick a calm and private time.
End With Solutions	Shows commitment to resolving issues together.	Summarise the talk with the next steps, like, “Let’s try this approach moving forward.”

CHAPTER 19

Freedom and Trust: Letting Her Fly

What will you get after taking her freedom away? Will that relationship last? No. Will it become toxic? Yes. Love isn't about clipping someone's wings; It's about supporting them in reaching new heights, breaking records and doing things that were earlier no one believed they could do. When you hold on too tight, you don't keep them close; you push them away.

A strong relationship grows on the basis of trust, not control. If she feels like she can't make her own decisions or live her life freely, what's left of the bond you've built? Your love is about respecting her choices, celebrating her milestones, supporting her highs & lows, and knowing she chooses to stay with you not because she has to but because she wants to.

Take a moment to think: Do you want her to feel caged? Freedom doesn't mean she doesn't care; it means she feels secure enough to share her life with you while still holding on to her individuality. It's about balancing connections and holding independence to be herself. In this chapter, we'll explore how trust is the backbone of any relationship and why letting her live her dreams, make her choices, and have her own space will only strengthen your bond. Let's talk about why freedom and trust go hand in hand to create something truly unshakable.

Respecting Her Independence While Staying Connected

In this, I am talking to you, yes, you. As I shared in one of the chapters, 3:33 was like our number. A moment that always reminded me of how we found each other, respected each other and grew together. You know, right? I've always respected your decisions, your independence, and the way you carry yourself in this world. I know you needed your space to grow. I made sure you had it because being with you never meant holding you back; it is always meant to support you to my fullest.

But also respecting your independence doesn't mean we drift apart. It's about staying connected in ways that feel natural and comforting, not forced or overbearing. I didn't need to know every step you took in your day, but I wanted to be the one you turned to when you wanted to share. That's the balance, a connection that's light but steady, supportive but never suffocating. There were moments when I didn't call or text, not because I didn't care, but because I trusted you were living your life the way you wanted.

And when you did call or text back, it felt special, not routine. Those small efforts reminded me that you still valued our bond, even with all the independence you cherished. Respecting someone's independence doesn't mean letting go; it means holding onto the relationship in a way that's loose enough to let them breathe and strong enough to keep them close. You don't demand updates or control their schedule. Instead, you focus on creating a space where they feel safe to come to you, not because they have to but because they want to.

In a relationship or being close, independence and connection are not opposites; they're partners. When you respect her freedom, you show her she can be herself without fear. And when you stay connected, you remind her that no matter where she goes or what she does, she's never alone.

That's how you keep love and that spark to become something Alive: by letting her fly while knowing she'll always come back to you.

Creating a Relationship Built on Mutual Freedom

Why is mutual freedom so important? Because it's the foundation for building a dream life together. In a relationship where both partners feel supported and unchained, emotions become a reality, and respect grows.

Let me share a recent incident. I was in college, casually sitting with a junior and chatting about my upcoming book. She was curious, asking about its content and how long it took to write. In the middle of our conversation, one of her friends joined us. The moment she sat down, I noticed something odd: four boys nearby started staring at us. No reason, no context, just straight-up staring. It didn't stop there.

They even tried to call me over, but I ignored them and moved to another location. It turns out that one of those boys liked the girl who had joined us, but she hadn't responded to his messages. What struck me wasn't the staring or the boy's behaviour; it was how uncomfortable the girl felt, as if she was being judged for simply sitting with us.

That moment made me think about how, in some relationships, people try to claim control over others, whether through expectations or ranting out their anger at their partner. This is where mutual freedom plays a crucial role. It's not about letting your partner "do whatever they want" out of indifference; it's about genuinely supporting them to live their life fully while still being part of your shared journey. To skyrocket your relationship, you need to feel free to express, grow and pursue your dreams without fear of being held back by the person you are in love with.

In relationships, mutual freedom means:

- Trusting your partner's choices without feeling insecure.
- Encouraging their independence so they achieve their goals, and you can proudly say, "She is my girl," or "He is my guy."
- To some extent, it is acceptable and not wrong to be possessive of your partner. However, when you begin to control their life instead of allowing them to feel like a free spirit, it means you are becoming an obstacle to their dreams and aspirations.

The junior's discomfort reminded me why building a relationship based on trust and understanding is so important. If you respect each other's individuality and create a space where both of you feel valued and supported, your bond becomes unshakable.

So, let them chase their dreams, make their choices, and embrace life as they see it. When you give freedom; you don't lose them; you become part of the reason they want to stay.

That's the magic of mutual freedom.

Quick Takeaways: Balancing Independence and Togetherness

Point	Explanation
Celebrate Solo Achievements	Cheer for their personal wins, even when you're not directly involved. It's about being genuinely happy for them.
Have "Me Time" Days	Schedule time to do things separately, like hobbies or outings. Absence makes the heart grow fonder, remember?
Share Random Up- dates	A quick "Hey, this reminded me of you" text can keep the connection alive during your solo time.
Don't Over Plan Together Time	Let spontaneous moments happen instead of forcing constant planning. It keeps things natural and fun.
Ask, Don't Assume	If they need space, ask what they need instead of assuming it's your problem. Communication is key.

Respect Their Solo Choices	Support their decision to hang out with friends or do something alone. It shows trust and maturity.
Mix It Up	Alternate between doing things as a team and individually so it feels balanced and not one-sided.
Create Shared Tradi- tions	Even while maintaining independence, build fun rituals like Friday movie nights or Sunday brunches.
Learn to Be Alone Together	Spend time in the same space doing different things it's comforting without being overbearing.
Avoid Keeping Score	Don't compare who spends more time alone or together. Focus on what works best for both of you.

CHAPTER 20

When Love and Bitter Salt Mix

I still remember when she fell off the stairs. I couldn't visit her because we were in a long-distance relationship. Sometimes, I still wonder, would things have worked out if I had put in more effort? This question always lingers in my mind, especially during moments when life feels overwhelming. Yet, the time we spent together over calls and video chats was precious. I cherish those memories, and I value her deeply. It's just that sometimes, life's circumstances force us to take different paths. There was even a time when I planned everything to visit her. The ticket was booked, my bag was packed, and I had sorted everything. But then, at the last minute, my mom found out and questioned me: "Where do you think you're going?" I hesitated. The trip I had been so excited about was suddenly off the table. I cancelled everything, and the disappointment hit me hard. I was so close yet so far from meeting her.

"Why didn't you tell me?" she asked later, her voice full of frustration and sadness. What followed was a whirlwind of questions, guilt, and regret. Sitting in my room with my packed bag, now useless, I realised how much these small missed moments add up in a relationship. They become like grains of salt sprinkled on love, just enough to sting but not enough to destroy.

We both tried to make it work. We called, shared our days, and laughed over silly things. Hearing her voice was the highlight of my day. I respected her, cherished her, and gave my best. But even with all that, the distance sometimes felt unbearable. Long-distance relationships are a test of patience, trust, and belief. They're about holding onto the good while navigating the challenges that are trying to make us fall apart. But the “what-ifs” still creep in. What if I had been there more often? What if I had tried harder? These questions don’t just disappear. They linger, especially on quiet nights when memories flood back. Love isn’t always about doing a lot of things or gifting expensive things. Sometimes, it’s about the little things, the effort to show up, the words left unsaid, and the moments you wish you could relive.

After parting ways, I called one of my old friends, someone who had always stood by me during both the hard and the good times. Truth be told, I had hurt her by suddenly stopping all communication. She waited... and waited. Her voice, when she picked up, carried that weight like she wanted to ask so many questions but chose not to.

Instead, she just said, “Oh my god, is it really you?” with a hint of excitement that couldn’t hide the underlying pain. I could feel it. Her warmth, though, didn’t waver. She listened to everything I had to say without judgment, without throwing my silence back in my face. Sometimes, it’s the people we unintentionally push away who remind us what real care feels like. At that moment, I realised how much I had missed her, how much I owed her an apology, not just for disappearing, but for taking her presence in my life for granted.

This chapter isn’t just about my story. It’s for anyone who has loved and lost, tried and failed, or still holds onto those bittersweet moments. Love isn’t perfect. It’s a mix of joy and pain, hope and heartbreak. It’s about trying, learning, and growing together. And even when it doesn’t work out as you hoped, it leaves you with lessons that stay forever.

Overcoming Challenges With Grace

Life isn’t always smooth, and relationships are no exception. Challenges will come; it’s how you handle them that defines your bond. Let me share a story. It’s about my Panda (the girl) and GG (the boy) might just hit close to home.

Panda and GG have been close for 4 years. They had their ups and downs but always managed to find their way back to each other. Then life threw them a lot of hurdles, few made them overthink, but some made them stronger.

When Panda lost her job, it hit her hard & made her lose confidence, and she started questioning her worth. Every time she looked at GG, she felt like she was letting him down. “What if he thinks I’m a burden?” she’d ask herself.

GG, on the other hand, was drowning in his own struggles. Work had been relentless, with deadlines and pressure piling up. He barely had time for himself, let alone their relationship. But he knew Panda needed him now more than ever.

One evening, as they sat on the couch, Panda stared blankly at the wall. GG noticed and slid a cup of tea toward her. “You okay?” he asked softly. She hesitated, then said, “What if I’m not enough for you anymore?” Her voice cracked, and tears welled up in her eyes. GG didn’t hesitate. He reached for her hand and said, “You’re more than enough, Panda. We’re a team. I am with you together in this, and this is just a bump in the road. We’ll get through it together, okay?”

His words felt like a warm hug. She nodded, wiping her tears & said, “I know, Bunny. You are with me.”

From that day, Panda started taking small steps to rebuild her confidence & learn new Skills. She worked on herself and started applying for jobs again. But GG didn’t just sit back. Despite his crazy schedule, he made time for her, cooking dinner together, taking walks and just listening to her vent after a rough day, and it wasn’t one-sided. Panda saw how exhausted GG was from work, so she started leaving little notes for him on his desk, things like “You’ve got this!” or “I’m so proud of you.” She even packed him snacks for his long workdays, small gestures to remind him he wasn’t alone. They didn’t have all the answers, but they showed up for each other in ways that mattered. That’s what made the difference.

Months later, Panda landed a job she loved, and GG’s big work project wrapped up successfully. But more than their individual wins, it was their bond that came out stronger as they stood by each other. The truth is that overcoming challenges doesn’t mean everything magically gets better overnight. It means sticking it out, choosing each other even when things are tough, choosing each other when people try to create a wall between you, trying to say different things to you, but you both still choose to talk it out, communicate and pass it.

So, when life gets messy, remember Panda and GG. Show up, even when it's hard. Hold on, even when it's uncomfortable. And remind your partner, "We'll face this together." Because when you do, you'll come out on the other side stronger and closer than ever.

Supporting Each Other Through Ups and Downs There was a time when Panda and I, GG, hit a rough patch. Out of nowhere, she stopped replying to my messages. At first, I thought she was busy, but days turned into weeks, and I didn't hear from her. I was confused, hurt, and worried. Around the same time, my health took a turn for the worse. Stress, lack of sleep, and bad eating habits caught up with me, and I ended up in the hospital Multiple times. It was life-threatening, but it was a wake-up call. I realised how much I missed her, and lying on that hospital bed, I kept wondering what had gone wrong. Months later, when I was back on my feet and moving on with life, her WhatsApp story was visible to me. My heart skipped a beat seeing her name pop up on my phone. I texted, "Hey!"

We decided to catch up over Text. The first few minutes were awkward, but then it all came out. She had been going through a lot, including family issues and dealing with her own mental health. "I wasn't in the right headspace," she admitted. "I didn't want to burden you with my problems." I took a deep breath and replied, "Panda, you don't have to go through things alone. That's what I'm here for. I would have done anything to support you, but I didn't even know what you were facing."

She went quiet, and then I could hear her trying to hold back tears. "I'm sorry, I'm sorry, GG, seriously sorry. I don't know if you forgive me." She said softly.

At that moment, I realised how important it is to create a safe space. Whether it's relationship, or you both are close, a space where you can share even the ugliest parts of your life without fear of judgment or rejection.

Our conversation didn't fix everything instantly, but it was a start. I told her about my hospital stay, and she felt awful for not being there. "I didn't know," she said, her voice filled with regret. We decided to move forward but with a promise: no matter how messy life got, we'd talk to each other. Whether it was a bad day at work, a family fight, or a health scare, we wouldn't go silent anymore.

That experience taught us both an important lesson: supporting each other isn't just about being there for the good times. It's about showing up during the bad ones, too. It's about listening, even when you don't fully understand. It's about giving the other person room to heal while also reminding them they're not alone.

Relationships aren't perfect. People make mistakes, emotions run high, and life can get overwhelming. But if you can stand by each other through the downs, the ups feel even more special.

So, if you're ever in a situation like this, where one of you feels lost, remember to reach out, listen, and rebuild together. Because true support is about being there, no matter what.

Quick Takeaways: Finding Strength in Adversity

Point	Explanation
Listen With Your Heart	Don't just hear their words feel what they're trying to express. Sometimes, silence says more.
Acknowledge Their Pain	A simple "I understand this is hard for you" can be deeply comforting.
Hold Space for Them	Let them cry, vent, or just sit quietly without feeling the need to fix everything.
Show Up Without Being Asked	Small gestures like sending a warm message or just being present can mean the world.
Be Their Calm in Chaos	When everything feels overwhelming, your steady presence can be the anchor they need.

Celebrate Even Tiny Steps Forward	Remind them how far they've come, no matter how small the progress feels.

How to Say “I’m Sorry” and Mean It

Apologies are not about who wins or loses; they’re about taking responsibility for your actions and genuinely wanting to make things right. A meaningful apology goes beyond just saying “sorry.” It acknowledges the hurt caused and expresses a commitment to change.

When you apologise, be specific. Instead of saying, “I’m sorry for whatever I did,” say, “I’m sorry for not listening to you when you needed me. I realise how much that hurt you now, and I’ll do better.” Acknowledge her feelings and let her know that you truly understand the impact of your actions.

The most important part of an apology is what comes after. Back your words with actions that show you’re serious about not repeating the same mistakes. True growth comes from learning, and a heartfelt apology is the first step toward rebuilding trust.

SECTION 7

Final Thoughts

CHAPTER 21

Knowing When to Step Back

He treated her right, or at least tried to. He respected her, cared for her, and made her feel valued. But even after years together, there was something missing. He didn't allow her to feel 100% secure in the relationship. He would talk to other girls, crossing boundaries that shouldn't have been crossed.

There's a line in every relationship, a limit we all understand. If you're in a relationship or planning to commit, there's no place for actions that hurt your partner. Yet, he kept engaging in flirty conversations and had moments of emotional carelessness. It wasn't just about her feelings being hurt; it was about the trust slowly chipping away, and once it actually slipped away, nothing was left.

He loved her. That much was true. He saw a future with her, wanted to grow together, and dreamed of building a life. But love isn't just about intentions. It's about actions. It's about not doing the things that make your partner feel less valued, less loved, or less important. He failed to realise that while he imagined a future, his present actions were making her question if she wanted that future at all. The thing that really affected her mental health, whether it was about choosing what she likes to do or even buying something new, was that she lost interest in everything that was in her life.

Sometimes, stepping back is not about giving up; it's about seeing things clearly. It's about acknowledging that love isn't enough when respect and trust are at risk. There comes a moment when, no matter how much you want to stay, stepping back might be the only way to save the love you once cherished or at least save yourself.

This chapter dives into those moments of clarity, the hard decisions we often avoid, and the courage it takes to step back for the right reasons. Because sometimes, love means letting go, even if it hurts.

Recognising When a Relationship No Longer Serves You Both

When you start noticing patterns in their behaviour, like neglecting you, keeping things to themselves or getting irritated at the smallest things, it's time to pause and reflect. Love doesn't feel like this. Relationships are supposed to make you feel safe, valued, and understood on a deeper level. It should not be like you're walking on edge or constantly doubting your worth.

Take Trisha and Raghav, for instance. They had been together for a year. In the beginning, everything was magical. Raghav would call her after every meeting, send her flowers just because, and always ask about her dreams and plans. Trisha felt as though she had found the person who values her as she does him; asking about dreams and plans is a very special thing for her. But slowly, things began to shift.

At first, it was minor, but Raghav stopped asking about her day as much. Then, he started cancelling their weekend plans, always saying he was "too busy." Trisha thought it was just a phase. She told herself that work stress might be getting to him. But over time, it became clear that something was different.

Raghav stopped sharing his thoughts. He'd spend hours on his phone, laughing at texts, but when Trisha asked, "Who's that?" he'd shrug it off. Conversations became short, and arguments were frequent. Even her excitement about small achievements was met with indifference.

One evening, Trisha planned a surprise dinner for Raghav, hoping to rekindle their bond. But he walked in late, barely noticed the effort, and muttered, "You didn't have to do all this." That night, as Trisha lay awake, she realised that the person beside her felt more like a stranger than the Raghav she had fallen in love with. The signs were all there: neglect, lack of communication, and an emotional distance that no amount of effort from her side seemed to bridge. It wasn't that Raghav didn't care; it was that he didn't care enough to match Trisha's effort.

She finally asked herself:

- Am I still a priority to him, or just an option?
- Do I feel heard and seen in this relationship, or am I constantly justifying my feelings?
- Am I staying because I'm afraid of letting go or because this truly makes me happy?

It was difficult and heartbreaking, but Trisha knew the answers. She realised that love alone wasn't enough when the effort and respect weren't mutual. Choosing to let go didn't mean she loved Raghav any less. It meant she loved herself enough to walk away from something that no longer nurtured her soul.

Sometimes, as Trisha learned, letting go is the kindest thing you can do. Yes, It is the kindest thing for yourself and the other person. It allows both of you to grow in the directions you're meant to, even if that means apart.

Raghav, on his part, eventually understood, too. He hadn't realised how much Trisha had been hurting because he was too wrapped up in his own world. But by the time he did, Trisha had already moved on, not with resentment, but with grace. She carried the lessons from their relationship with her, knowing that she deserved someone who matched her energy and effort.

Love isn't about forcing things to work when they've already unravelled. It's about knowing when to step back, even when it hurts, to protect your peace and allow space for something better to grow. Like Trisha and Raghav, sometimes the hardest thing to do is also the right thing. And that's okay.

{Guys, I know it's hard. I know it's not what you wanted from day one. But believe me, sometimes, even when you know you love the other person a lot, for their own good and your peace of mind, you need to, no, you have to, take a step back.}

And I am sorry; I know you want me back, even After what I have done, but I don't think so. I am deserving of your Pure feelings.

It's not you. It's ME.

Walking Away With Dignity and Respect

Walking away from someone you deeply love is one of the hardest decisions to make, but it's also one of the most powerful acts of self-respect. Let's talk about Trisha and Raghav again. They shared so many beautiful memories like late-night drives, laughing over silly jokes, and supporting each other through tough times. But as time went on, the relationship became more about sacrifices that only Trisha was making.

Raghav, despite loving Trisha, started taking her for granted. He would forget the little things that mattered to her, like showing up on time or listening when she shared her feelings. Trisha tried to hold on, convincing herself that things would improve, that he would notice her efforts and start reciprocating.

One day, after yet another moment of being let down, Trisha sat down and reflected on what the relationship had become. She asked herself, "Am I still happy? Does this relationship add to my life, or is it draining me?" The answer wasn't what she wanted to admit, but it was clear she was losing herself trying to hold on to someone who didn't value her the same way anymore.

When she finally decided to walk away, she did it with dignity. Trisha didn't blame him for the pain she was carrying. She calmly explained her feelings, thanked Raghav for the moments they shared, and left without looking back. It wasn't easy, but she knew it was necessary for her own growth and peace.

Walking away with dignity means understanding that ending a relationship doesn't mean erasing the good times. It's about recognising when it's no longer healthy and choosing to respect yourself enough to let go. It's not about winning or losing, but it's about making space for something better, whether that's personal healing or a healthier connection in the future.

Sometimes, the greatest love you can show someone is letting them go, and the greatest respect you can show yourself is walking away with your head held high.

CHAPTER 22

Creating a Legacy Together

Diksha was pursuing her master's degree from IIT Bombay, a dream she had nurtured since her teenage years. It was a rigorous program, but she loved every bit of it: the challenges, the learning, and the campus life. Calvin, on the other hand, was a startup founder in Pune, juggling endless meetings, investor pitches, and sleepless nights to build his dream company. Despite the distance and their busy schedules, they made their relationship work. One evening, Diksha called Calvin after a long day of classes.

"Calvin, can you believe it? I finally submitted the research paper I've been working on for months!" she exclaimed, her voice filled with excitement.

"That's amazing, Dee! I knew you'd crush it," Calvin replied with pride. "We need to celebrate this properly. When's the next time you can come to Pune?" Diksha laughed. "Celebrating for submitting a paper? You're too much, Cal. But honestly, I don't know when I'll have time. My schedule is packed. Let's just celebrate virtually for now." "Virtual celebration won't do justice," Calvin said, his tone serious yet playful. "This is big, Diksha. You're setting the foundation for your legacy, and I want to be there to cheer you on every step of the way."

His words made her pause. "Legacy?" she asked, her voice softening.

"Yes, legacy," Calvin said. "Think about it, Diksha. All the hard work you're putting into your Education and the values you stand for. It's not just about your career. It's about what we build together, too. I want us to create something that lasts, something meaningful."

Diksha felt a lump in her throat. “You always know how to make me feel special, Calvin. But what about your legacy? You’re the one building a company that could change lives.” Calvin smiled on the other end of the call. “Exactly. But that’s not just my legacy; it’s ours. The way you inspire me to keep going, the way you remind me of what truly matters, that’s part of it, too.” This made both of them smile and sleep over the video call, Looking at each other with hope in their eyes and smiling about the moment they were sharing.

The next weekend, Calvin surprised Diksha by driving all the way to Mumbai. They met at a cosy cafe near her campus, where they spent hours talking about their dreams and aspirations.

“Let’s promise to always support each other, no matter what,” Diksha said, holding Calvin’s hand across the table.

“Always,” Calvin replied, his eyes locking with hers. “And let’s not just dream about building something big. Let’s actually do it together.”

They didn’t just talk about their personal goals; they also discussed ways they could make an impact on the world. Diksha had a passion for education and wanted to mentor underprivileged students. Calvin, inspired by her vision, suggested they start a scholarship fund once his startup became successful. This chapter isn’t just about their love story; it’s about the power of shared dreams and mutual support. Diksha and Calvin’s journey shows that when two people come together with a common vision, they can create a legacy that’s bigger than themselves. Their story is a reminder that love, when combined with purpose, can truly change the world.

Building a Relationship That Inspires Others

Diksha and Calvin’s relationship wasn’t just about love; it was about creating something bigger together. They supported each other through their own goals, and their bond started inspiring the people around them. One day, Diksha was giving a seminar at IIT Bombay, talking about balancing her studies and personal growth. During the Q&A session, a student asked her nervously, “Ma’am, how do you manage to stay so focused while being in a relationship? Isn’t it distracting?”

Diksha smiled. “That’s a great question. A good relationship doesn’t distract you; it helps you focus better. Calvin, my partner, is my biggest cheerleader. He always pushes me to aim higher, and we remind each other of our goals.”

Meanwhile, Calvin was leading a team-building session for his startup. After the session, one of his team members came up to him and said, “Sir, we’ve heard about you and Diksha, ma’am. Your relationship sounds really inspiring. How do you stay so committed to both your work and her?”

Calvin laughed. “It’s not always easy, but we’ve figured out what works for us. We cheer each other on and celebrate every small win. It’s not about giving something up; it’s about growing together.”

Their relationship started to give hope to people who believed love and ambition couldn’t go hand in hand. Diksha would post little moments from their life online—like Calvin encouraging her during late-night study sessions or the two of them brainstorming ideas for their future. These weren’t flashy posts; they were real and honest moments of two people building each other up.

One evening, while planning their future goals, Calvin said, “You know, Dee, people are watching us. And it feels like they’re learning from what we’re doing. That’s kind of amazing, isn’t it?”

Diksha nodded. “It is. We’re not perfect, but if our story helps someone believe in their own dreams or their relationship, then it’s all worth it.”

But sometimes I also fear it a lot. We don’t know who wishes the best for us or is cursing. Calvin said, “I believe in us, Diksha! I am here. We are together in this. No Worries.” Their journey became an inspiration for others. They didn’t need loud declarations of love. The way they supported and believed in each other spoke volumes. Together, they showed that a relationship doesn’t mean losing your identity; it means helping each other grow.

Diksha and Calvin proved that a strong bond isn’t just good for the people in it; it can inspire others to work hard, love deeply, and believe in their dreams. It’s not about being flawless. It’s about being there for each other and building a life others admire.

Growing Together Beyond the Conventional

Below is a practical plan for long-distance couples and those who can meet often. It highlights how to grow together while maintaining individuality and a healthy relationship.

Long-Distance Couples (GG and Panda)

1. Weekly Connection Rituals:

- Pick a fixed time each week to have uninterrupted video calls. Use this time to share updates, discuss goals, and just laugh together.
- GG and Panda, for instance, had a Friday night “virtual dinner date” where they’d eat together while catching up.

2. Celebrate Small Wins Together:

- Whenever one of you achieves something (like Panda acing her exam or GG landing a new client), celebrate it together, even from a distance. Send a small gift or plan a celebratory call.

3. Shared Projects:

- Start something together, like creating a shared playlist, writing a story, or planning a trip. It keeps you connected and gives you something to look forward to.
- GG and Panda once created a dream travel map, marking all the places they wanted to visit when they could meet in person.

4. Random Acts of Love:

- Surprise each other with small things. Maybe GG sends Panda her favourite snacks, or she sends him a handwritten letter. Little gestures go a long way in keeping the bond alive.

5. Plan Future Meetings:

- Always have a date in mind for when you'll meet next. It gives both of you something tangible to look forward to, making the distance easier to handle.

Couples Who Can Meet Often (Calvin and Diksha)

1. Balance Personal and Shared Goals:

- Talk openly about your dreams and how you can support each other. Like Diksha pursuing her master's while Calvin focuses on his startup, they cheer each other on during busy days.

1. Quality Over Quantity:

- It's not about how often you meet but what you do with that time. Plan dates that allow deep conversations or fun activities that both enjoy. For instance, they had "Learning Sundays," where they'd explore new hobbies together.

2. Create Space for Independence:

- Respect each other's need for personal time. Diksha loved her study hours, and Calvin respected that by not interrupting her, even if he missed her.

3. Gratitude Moments:

- End each day (or week) by sharing one thing you appreciated about each other. It strengthens your bond and keeps the focus on the positives.

2. Handle Conflicts Gracefully:

- When arguments happen, don't avoid them. Sit down, talk calmly, and find solutions together. Calvin and Diksha made a rule never to go to bed angry. It kept their relationship healthy. It helps them to calm out and keep this thought in mind to resolve it.

The Heart of Growing Together:

Whether you live close or apart, the key is communication, trust, and effort. Celebrate small moments, support each other's dreams, and always find ways to grow. Both as individuals and as a couple. GG and Panda, Calvin and Diksha teach us that love isn't just about being together; it's about building a life that inspires, supports, and evolves with time. That doesn't stress you but pushes you to do more, try more and achieve more in this life.

CHAPTER 23

Conclusion: The Journey to Treating Her Right

She is a girl who was treated like a princess by her father. He gave her everything: love, care, and respect. He made sure to always protect her from the harshness of the world. She hopes for the same respect, care, and love when she steps into a relationship. Not because she's entitled, but because she's used to being treated as someone special. But the truth is, relationships aren't easy. They come with their own set of challenges, misunderstandings, and growing pains. Yet, at their core, they are built on the simple idea of treating your partner right.

Treating her right doesn't mean buying expensive gifts or making grand gestures every day. It's in the little things: listening when she speaks, being there when she needs you, and respecting her individuality. It's about making her feel safe, loved, and valued, just as her father once did.

This journey is not just about her; it's about both of you. It's about becoming the kind of person who is not only worthy of love but also capable of giving it wholeheartedly. Treating her right isn't a task; it's a mindset, a way of life, and a promise you keep every single day.

As you turn the last pages of this book, remember that love isn't perfect. It's messy, unpredictable, and sometimes painful. But when you choose to treat her right, you build a bond that stands strong through the storms.

This isn't just the end of a book; it's the beginning of a lifelong journey to nurture and cherish the love you have. She's not just your partner; she's your teammate, your confidante, and the person who will stand by your side through it all.

So, take what you've learned here, apply it, and keep building a love story that both of you can be proud of. Treat her like she's the most important person in your life because if she loves you, she's already treating you like her king.

The journey to treating her right starts and ends with one thing: your commitment to be better every single day.

Reflecting on Your Growth as a Partner

It's not a one-man show; it's your team's efforts. Relationships are built with two people contributing, learning, and growing together. It's about how you both support each other to become the best versions of yourselves, not just as individuals but as a unit.

There comes a time when you'll look back at the early days of your relationship, the nervous beginnings, the mistakes, the arguments, and the shared dreams. These memories are your milestones, marking the growth you've experienced as a partner. Growth isn't about never making mistakes; it's about learning from them, taking responsibility, doing better the next time and accepting it from your partner.

Think about it: Have you started listening more? Are you more patient now than you were before? Do you notice the small things that make her smile? These little shifts show how far you've come. They may seem minor, but they are the foundation of a stronger relationship and the moments you both look back to.

For instance, imagine a time when she needed you the most; maybe she was feeling low. How did you respond? Did you sit beside her, hold her hand, and let her know she wasn't alone? These moments matter more than any other gesture because they show growth in your empathy and understanding.

Growth as a partner also means recognising your flaws and working on them. Maybe you were too quick to anger or too stubborn to apologise. Maybe you took her for granted at times. Reflecting on these behaviours isn't about guilt; it's about acknowledging where you can improve and actively working to be a better partner. Keep in mind that it's been a continuous process over the years.

And don't forget; it's not just about your growth but hers too. Notice how she has also evolved, how she communicates, how she supports you, and how she handles challenges. Celebrate this growth together. A healthy relationship is where you both push each other to grow, not by force but through encouragement and love.

So, take a moment to reflect. Look at the hurdles you've crossed together, the fights you resolved, and the compromises you made. These aren't just stories; they're evidence of the work you've put in and the bond you've strengthened.

The journey of growth doesn't have an endpoint; it's continuous. But every step, every effort, and every lesson brings you closer to the relationship you both deserve. Your every move counts.

Continuing the Journey Beyond This Book

So, here we are, wrapping things up, but let's be real, this isn't goodbye. Think of this book as a conversation, not the final word. Relationships? They're a mix of laughter, mess-ups, and those quiet moments when everything just clicks.

Some days, you'll feel like a rockstar partner, and other days. . . well, you'll wonder if you're even in the right key. That's okay. What matters is showing up, trying, and remembering why you started this beautiful, messy, one-of-a-kind journey in the first place.

Celebrate the little wins, like making her laugh at your terrible jokes. Learn from the not-so-great moments. And never stop reminding her how much she means to you. Because love—Is not about being perfect. It's about being present. And the best part? Your journey together is just getting started.

A Girl-to-Girl Conversation: Aish and Aashi

Aish: So, did you finish the book?

Aashi: Oh my god, yes! I finished it last night. And let me tell you, it felt like the author was talking directly to me. What about you?

Aish: Same! I actually highlighted so many parts. The whole "treating her right" thing hit me differently. It's not just about relationships but life in general, don't you think?

Aashi: Absolutely. I mean, that part about respecting independence while staying connected? That was gold. It's something people don't really talk about much.

Aish: Exactly! And I loved how the author used stories to explain everything. It wasn't preachy, just real. I could see myself in some of those situations.

Aashi: Same here. Do you remember the chapter about not going to bed angry? That hit hard. I'm guilty of doing that sometimes, and it made me realise how damaging it can be.

Aish: Oh, for sure. I used to think, "Ah, let's sleep on it. We'll talk tomorrow." But the book made me see how unresolved stuff just grows bigger overnight.

Aashi: Right! And the way it explained empathy? Like, not just saying sorry but actually making your partner feel heard? That was a game-changer.

Aish: Totally. I feel like so many people underestimate how powerful reassurance is. It's not just about saying "I love you," but showing it in little ways every day.

Aashi: Oh, speaking of reassurance, that chapter was my favourite. The author wrote about how small gestures, like checking in or being consistent, can mean the world. I teared up a little reading that.

Aish: I know, right? It made me think about my own relationships, romantic and otherwise. Am I really showing people that they matter to me?

Aashi: Same here. And don't even get me started on the "How to take care of her during her periods" part. Like, finally, someone put it into words without making it awkward!

Aish: Yesss! That was so relatable. I mean, it's not just about bringing chocolates or heating pads. It's about being emotionally present.

Aashi: Exactly. It's about understanding that it's a tough time and just being there, you know? Honestly, every guy should read that chapter.

Aish: Agreed. But you know what I also loved? The part about creating a legacy together. It wasn't just about being a good partner but building something meaningful as a team.

Aashi: Oh, yes! That hit deep. It's not just about the "now," but thinking long-term, like, how can we grow together?

Aish: And the stories the author included? Like the one about Diksha and Calvin? That was so inspiring.

Aashi: I know! It made me think about what kind of legacy I want to leave behind, not just in relationships but in life.

Aish: Same here. It's like relationships aren't just about love and romance; they're about mutual respect, growth, and being each other's biggest cheerleaders.

Aashi: And being honest, even when it's hard. Remember the chapter about having tough conversations? That was so real.

Aish: Oh, absolutely. It's easy to avoid difficult topics, but the book showed how important it is to face them head-on.

Aashi: Exactly. And the part where the author said, "Treat her like she's the one who saved you"? That gave me chills.

Aish: Me too. It's such a powerful reminder to never take someone for granted.

Aashi: You know what? I feel like this book isn't just for guys. It's for everyone.

Aish: I totally agree. I mean, even as a girl, I learned so much about how I can be a better partner.

Aashi: Same. It's not just about how you're treated but how you treat others.

Aish: And let's not forget the dedication page. Did you read it?

Aashi: Oh my god, yes! "Mental Khana"? I laughed so hard at that. It felt so personal as if the author was letting us into their world.

Aish: I know! It made the whole book feel even more real. Aashi:

So, are you going to recommend this book to anyone? Aish: Are you kidding? I've already told half my friends about it!

Aashi: Same here. I feel like everyone needs to read this, whether they're in a relationship or not.

Aish: Exactly. It's not just a book; it's like a guide to understanding people better.

Aashi: And yourself, too. I feel like I've grown just by reading it.

Aish: Same. I'm going to re-read it, for sure. There's so much to take in.

Aashi: Me too. And hey, did you notice how the author ended with such a strong message? It felt like a pep talk for life.

Aish: Oh, totally. It was like, "Hey, you've got this. Go be the best version of yourself."

Aashi: Exactly. And you know what? I think I will.

Aish: Me too, Aashi. Me too.

Aashi: Let's keep each other accountable, okay?

Aish: Deal. And hey, if you ever need a reminder, just think of this book.

Aashi: Always. This isn't just a book; it's a wake-up call.

Aish: I couldn't have said it better myself.

Aashi: Cheers to growing, learning, and treating each other right.

Aish: Cheers to that!

At the end of the day, love is not about grand gestures or perfect words. It's about showing up, being kind, and understanding each other's hearts. Whether it's through small daily efforts or deeper conversations, what matters most is making the other person feel valued and safe. Relationships thrive when both partners work together, forgive each other, and never stop growing. Remember, no love story is perfect, but the beauty lies in how you write yours, one chapter at a time. Keep nurturing, keep believing, and most importantly, keep loving with all your heart.

LETTER BY THE AUTHOR

We've all made unintentional mistakes, others when we should've known better. And yet, we stumble, learning through the pain. Why do we do it? There's no single answer, but from my personal experience, I've learned something important: No one is perfect. We all have flaws, habits we're not proud of, and moments of weakness that test us. Others might admire you for your charm, your ability to connect, or your way with words. But deep inside, you know where you fall short.

As humans, we crave more and more. When things come easily, we sometimes forget to appreciate what we already have. It's easy to slip, to let attention from others pull you away from what matters most. You might find yourself building a connection with someone, even when you already have someone by your side, someone who's meant to stay. You never intended for this to happen. But one day, the fragile world you've built shatters into pieces.

What now? You face a choice. You can pretend nothing happened, repeat the same mistakes, or take the time to fix yourself. To heal, to grow, to become someone who treats others with the love and respect they deserve.

She stayed by my side, even when I broke her heart. Her forgiveness taught me the power of love. To the girl who chose to stay: You're one of a kind. I'll always respect you, not just for forgiving me but for inspiring me to become better.

To the readers of this book: Cherish the one who stands by you in your darkest moments. Love isn't about being flawless; it's about accountability, growth, and showing your partner they are worthy, never optional. Mistakes don't define us, but our response to them does. Choose to reflect, grow, and rebuild what matters most. This book isn't just a story; it's a guide, a reminder of what "How to Treat Her Right" truly means. Take these lessons to heart. Treat your partner with care, let your actions speak louder than your words, and watch your relationship transform.
